CLAIRVOYANTS AND PALMISTS.

Dress Perverision. For English and American women to follow blindly the dictates of Parisian fashion is says Dr. Emil Reich, a quite charming idea. The newspaper the civilized world is mostly arranged at Paris and in, of course, adapted to French women, hence it follows that when English and American women adopt it bodily the effect is sometimes incongruous.

The make of a French woman is essentially different, he avers, from that of an Anglo-Saxon woman. The latter is fine in repose; the French woman is charming by her movements.

From this alone it follows that in France women excel where the small details, or the finely differentiated joints of the various parts of the body, such as the attitude of the neck, the elbow, of the wrist, of the ankles; in one word, French women are frequently well acquainted with the art of making themselves as favorably as possible. A woman lacking these subtle graces and joints distinguishing her several organs will gain nothing by wearing a costume originally meant for the charms of French attaches.

Or take the head. A head with fine lines in the forehead, the nose, the hair and the face in clear contrast in harmony, wants a hat totally different from that needed for a head whose chief attractions are only a fine pair of eyes or beautiful hair.

The complexion and the hair and eyes are the chief attractions of the Anglo-Saxon woman. Dr. Reich thinks and these points should be emphasized in the costume.

It is precisely in hats where the Anglo-Saxon woman comes to grief. But many French women with no great hair to speak of, but that very quality of lines about her head, and would look quite charming in the costume used by a French woman to curl her hair, tying it beneath her provocative chin.

Or consider another point. English women walk very much more rapidly than do French women. In fact, while the French woman is in the street, she is in the action of running. All this indicates a difference in the style of the hard and soft parts of the body.

And if now we consider that the French woman converses with her companion without emphasizing every word with a gesture, while in England the French woman converses with her companion as if she had no voice, we cannot but see that female dress in France is meant to accompany, shade and color her conversation, and having no mark of hers; velvet is applied to soften a malicious adjective, and silk and its derivatives are used to make the shivers into commonplace phrases.

The secret of all female dress is in the wearing of the style of woman to have, a life of its own. It has a grammar and music of its own. To lay the color of the dress, the texture, the like lying upon one's head, the volumes of Plato and Aristotle—one does not get the water for it.

The conclusion then is this. Women in England do not excel in devising their proper costume because they will merely imitate the style of woman essentially different from them.

But why do so? Why insist sometimes with excessive individualism, on English houses, English food, English drinks or no drinks, English table manners, English games, and why not apply some of this individualism to the devising of a costume better adapted to the build, nature and habits of English women?

Talked With Napoleon.

There is still living in the village of Ligny, Belgium, an old soldier who spoke with the great Napoleon on the day of the battle—June 16, 1815—at that place. His name is Axel von Scharnhorst, and he will reach his 102d birthday July 29.

By memory is still perfectly clear as to the incidents. Napoleon had established his headquarters close to the little farm where Axel lives. He spoke alone. Her parents had buried a little stock of money and valuables in the ground, and in the morning the emperor came out and took up his position close to the spot.

Feeling that he might discover the hiding place of the money, he was attracted his attention, took her head in both hands and pretended to be suffering from toothache, and she told him that she would not be afraid, but added that

Your Suburban Home

At Less Expense Than to Buy Water From the City Mains

The STAR Windmill. A suburban or country home needs plenty of pure water for the kitchen, bath room, gardens and lawn; and our Star Suburban Outfit, here illustrated, provides a plentiful supply for such purposes.

The reputation of the Star has been made by service in every part of the country, pumping from deep wells and shallow wells, in cold and warm climates, in strong winds and gentle breezes. It will respond to the slightest movement of the air, and will withstand the hardest storm that blows.

When you think of a windmill, you think of a squeaking, rattling destroyer of the neighborhood quiet, but the Star runs smoothly—because it has few wearing parts and they are accurately adjusted.

The splendid smoking qualities of IMPERIALES CIGARETTES have built up such a standard for them in the West that you'll hear men every day say to one another, "Got an Imperiales?" instead of merely "Got a cigarette?" It's the rich taste—the real smoking satisfaction—of Imperiales that have made the name mean "good smoke" everywhere.

That thin mals paper—crimped, not pasted—adds the rich Imperiales blend of tobacco in smoking smoothly and deliciously to the mouthpiece—and keeps them free from that "after effect" found with other cigarettes.

10 for 10 cents

The men of the West smoked 100,000,000 Imperiales in 1906.

The Shortest Soldier

How Young Kansan Under Required Height Got Into the Army.

From the Kansas City Journal. Charles L. Dagan of Santa, Kansas, a young army recruit who enlisted in Kansas City and left with a squad of recruits for Jefferson barracks, near St. Louis, is probably the shortest soldier in the United States army.

His height is 5 feet 3 inches. He was accepted on the recommendation of President Roosevelt to whom he wrote explaining the situation after he had been rejected on account of his height at the auxiliary recruiting station at Topeka early in April.

Dagan had entertained the hope of becoming a soldier for several years. He is now 22, and having no one dependent upon him, he went to the recruiting station to enter the service. He passed a rigid examination save for his height, but the news that for this reason he could not become a soldier did not deter him. He had decided to become one, and promptly wrote to President Roosevelt explaining the situation. He made an earnest appeal to the chief executive and the frank, earnest manner in which he couched his plea seemed to strike the president as that of the man who would make a good soldier.

After many years of service, he was a representative in congress from the Democratic national convention.
