A barometric depression has made its appearance over British Columbia, but it has not, as yet, developed any of the characteristics of a storm area. The pressure continues relatively high over the Washington coast. Cloudiness was prevalent this morning over western Washington, but elsewhere over this forecast district the sky was clear. Light rain fell at North Head during last night. The storm area noted yearerday morning over the upper lake region has disappeared off the Atlantic coast. Moderate rains over the middle Atlantic and New England states marked its eastward course. A moderate rise in temperatures was noted at Spokane and a marked rise at Pocatello during the 24 hours ending with this report. Changes elsewhere over the western portion of the country were unimportant.
