

OPERATORS' BALL
BRILLIANT FETE

Telegraphers Score Big Success Both Socially and Financially.

Persons who attended the ball given by the striking telegraphers at Merriack hall last night would never have believed the men had a care on earth save to enjoy themselves. More than 800 tickets were sold, and 250 couples were on the floor when the music struck up for the first dance.

him with any other actor. He absorbed the spirit of a part, and then presented it as he considered it best. What others have done was not considered. He created and he had firm belief in his creation.

Mr. Mansfield was a self-made actor. It came into his own as the greatest actor on the English speaking stage, it was entirely through his own efforts.

Mr. Mansfield had reflected his greatest admirers will admit this, and his mannerisms have been frequently pointed out. Once when this subject was brought up in his hearing, he said: "People talk about my mannerisms. I wish they would tell me what they mean so that I may correct them."

All of the productions of Mr. Mansfield were noted for the elaborate manner in which they were staged—every detail had to be perfect and time and expense were not considered. The costumes and settings had to be historically correct, and the result was a perfect production.

ROUGH AND POWDER
SCORCHED IN PARIS.

became the head of his profession, creating many parts. Mansfield's range of characters was wide, and extended from Ko Ko in "The Mikado" to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt," the last character he created.

Mr. Mansfield, as has been said, had played everything from a high society lord to a beggar, and he was equally successful in both.

Mr. Mansfield was a superb host. No hotels for him if he could possibly avoid them. He demanded a home—consequently when he was appearing in a city for a few weeks, he leased apartments, and there he received his friends.

mitted by those who are preparing for even fumigation in some question whether the rats, and the spreading of poison over the garbage heaps will be a source of danger to valuable property.

A particularly choice spot for the breeding of these dangerous rodents is the foot of Yamhill street. This mass of decaying fruits, vegetables and old clothing, which is piled up like a mountain, is a fitting place for the rats.

The nature of Mr. Mansfield was passionate, whimsical, impatient and independent. To one who met him casually it would first disclose itself. The impatience and impetuosity of the man directed his career on the stage. He did not do things as other men—as other professionals—do.
