N. W. Osterhout is one of the men of Portland to establish a new enterprise. Something more than a year ago he conceived the idea that there is a field in the northwest for a school of telegraphy and railroading. Accordingly he established the Oregon Expert college with the motto, "A railway college conducted by railway men."

Mr. Osterhout won the confidence of the officials of the main line railroads terminating at Portland and convinced them that he could prepare men and women for their service. The lack of competent people for their various departments caused a ready co-operation on the part of these officials and they were very glad to recognize the school and to aid it in every way possible. Has Main Line Wire.

As one of the helps, the railroads have contributed to the equipment of the Oregon Expert college by installing their regular main line train dispatcher's wires, whereby students of the college may listen to regular train orders while taking instruction. This is a privilege accorded very few telegraph colleges in the United States. The Oregon Expert college offers its students distinct advantages in preparation for any position in railroad students distinct advantages in preparation for any position in railroad work. It fits young men and young ladies to become station agents; for desks in departments of higher railroading. The instruction is given by experienced railroad men. Mr. Osterhout himself had 12 years of continuous and successful service with commercial and railroad companies. Can Be Had Pres.

The growth of the college has necessitated larger quarters. It is located on the fourth floor of the Commonwealth building, one block north of the magnificent Wells-Farge building, the headquarters of officials of every railway running into Portland. departure of this excellent group of players—Franklyn Underwood. Edward Emory, Frances Slosson, and others of lesser prominence. It is a strong, acting organization and ranks well up with the best stock companies on the Pacific coast coast.

There is every indication that there will be something in the nature of a public demonstration at the Marquam tonight when the friends and admirers of the company gather to wish them goodbye. "The Carnival of Love," is admirably adapted for laughter making and the sadness of parting will be softened by the bubbling humor of the play.
