U. S. TREASURER NEEDS 2 CENTS. Obliging Ticket Seller Comes to Aid and Wins Official's Friendship.

While confidence in human nature is not wholly restored among the "L" road ticket-sellers smarting under losses from Canadian dimes and "plugged" nickels passed on them, nevertheless a new sentiment of trustfulness has suddenly become apparent, says the New York World.

One day six weeks ago an elderly gentleman, solemnly clad and burdened with two traveling bags, hurried up the stairs of the Sixth avenue downtown "L" station at Thirty-third street and halted at the office window.

"Dear me, dear me," muttered the man with the traveling bags, whose oriental cast of features and a south-bound train. "I'm the United States Treasurer, my friend," he continued.

"Ticket-seller Doubtful." "You're what?" asked Van Valkenburg, eyeing the stranger coldly and critically. "I'm just what I said—the United States treasurer," snapped the despairing man.

Gets Letter From Treat. So the letter was written and mailed, and by return mail came an answer that made Van Valkenburg glow with pride. Here is the letter: Treasury Department, Office of the Treasurer of the United States, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Van Valkenburg—I got home yesterday, and am very much amused at your letter inquiring if I am the real treasurer of the United States. Yes, I am the real coin and no counterfeit.

Excitantly shaking the documentary evidence under the noses of the scoffers, Van Valkenburg spoke feelingly: "So you folks thought that old Van had been fooled, did you? You forgot that he is wise to the high sign of the Panhandlers' union and that all styles of 'brace' and 'touch' from brass-finishes to tear-soaked, are old to him.

My wife says I could travel, she believes to the Pacific coast on my personal word, but I always make good. This is rather an amusing episode, and I hope the sequel may help the other fellow who may need some time to get a hold of his wits.
