Conservative estimate of the number of idle railroad cars in the Pacific northwest is said to be 6,000 to 7,000. These figures include the states of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Nevada and Arizona.

A Boston dispatch from the Journal says that according to compilations by the United States bureau of the number of idle cars in the United States. The same bureau's figures on the states of Oregon, Idaho, California, Nevada and Arizona show the number of idle cars in those states at 3,552.

There are more idle cars than that in the states of Oregon and California alone. If the Boston bureau's figures are as far under the fact for other states in the country, the estimate for the whole United States is believed to be fully 40 per cent too low.

The Boston estimate for Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota and North Dakota gives the number of idle cars at 40,454. It is stated that this group of states shows the largest aggregate of idle cars, which would indicate that the crop movement is practically complete for the last year's harvest.

It is estimated that the crop moved at about two-thirds of the total. It is said the other third is being held by farmers for higher prices, and by interstate carriers for the holding of the crop.

The loss of business to the railroads is believed to be the largest since the war. The loss of business to the railroads is believed to be the largest since the war.
