

LIVESTOCK STATE'S HOPE

Coming of Huge Packing Plants Opens New Era in Oregon's Industrial Life—Country Here Produces Standard Required.

Fat steers, the commercial livestock factor that has been worth millions of dollars to Chicago and Kansas City, are beginning to make themselves heard in Oregon. Over 5,000 head of these steers are now being fed in the Butter Creek district of central Oregon, and a few days ago 224 head were sold for $30,000. The recipients of these handsome profits were R. N. Stanfield and Fred Andrews of Butter Creek.

Two shipments have recently been sent out from the Echo and Butter Creek alfalfa belt, where they were fattened on that ration. The first shipment of 224 head brought over $62 apiece and the last shipment, 19 carloads with 250 steers in the lot, brought about the same average price. There is ample evidence in every direction that Oregon will come up to the livestock standards required by a great packing center, and that the packers who are establishing their plants in Oregon will not be disappointed in the quality of meat they receive from Oregon ranches. Not only will the cattle be bred up to the middle west standard, but the same course will be adopted for hogs, which are now the greatest cause of anxiety among the packers.

Good Hogs and Pigs.

The corn-fed hog of the middle west, with its enormous hams and broad back, and a short nose that merely protrudes from between two rolling shoulders, is the packer's delight. This class of hog, it has been proven, can be produced in highest perfection by proper breeding, a red clover and straw ration substituted for corn.

Oregon Has It All.

Discussing the prospect for the livestock industry in Oregon, G. A. Westgate, secretary of the Portland Oregon club and livestock association, said: "The hog made Chicago. The steer made Kansas City. The sheep has made many cities, old world and new. The horse has made empires. The whole useful creaturaldom, through the Pacific National show, is waiting here available for Portland's every useful purpose."

THE PLAY

It was an intensely interested, if not overly enthusiastic audience that witnessed Clay Clement play "The Bells" at the Marquam last night. From the standpoint of dramatic construction there is no more perfect play on the modern stage than "The Bells." It is a joy to see the plot unfold, to sit through an evening's performance where there is never an unnecessary word and watch the really wonderful construction of the piece.

As Mathias Mr. Clement is most painstaking and on the whole most effective. It is a characterization that reveals a close study of the part of the conscience-stricken murderer, and furthermore he gives an interpretation that is his own and that will stand the test of careful attention. The star has so long played delicately sentimental parts that his ability to take up "The Bells" and do it effectively at the same time necessarily challenges comparison with other and greater men is remarkable.

Mr. Clement makes of his Mathias a man who dissembled to perfection, who argued with himself and at times almost convinced himself that he was innocently overruled. The black pall of guilt seems pushed out of memory at times. Mathias seems almost to win his fight over remorse, to appear the honest, kindly burgomaster not only to the world, but to himself. The catastrophe and the ruin accompanying it seem peculiarly emphasized by this treatment, as something that one thinks may be avoided, must be avoided, until it suddenly overwhelms its victim.
