LAST CONCERT ONE OF BEST OF THE FESTIVAL

By G. I. W.

"And hinder not music; pour not out thy talk where there is a performance of music, and display not thy wisdom out of season."—Ecclesiasticus.

It was really a pity that the lasting impression from the final concert of the Chicago Symphony orchestra last night should have been one of ignorance and ill-breeding. Musical ignorance probably admitted on passes, for they never would have paid from $1 to $2 for a chance to talk to orchestral accompaniment, untrained ushers fairly breathing with their unaccustomed importance and unable to possess themselves in any spot for more than five minutes, curious listeners who came only to ascertain whether the orchestra was a reality or not, and, having been satisfied, timed their departure in the midst of a number—such comprised the audience.

Of course, there were enough of the other kind who went to hear the music only to get the full benefit of people's ill manners. One woman turned and in a very sweet and gentle manner said to two persons behind her, who had much wisdom foreign to music of which to unburden themselves, "Would you please mind not talking while they are playing?" and accompanied the remark with an apologetic smile. And the sitters behind that were heaped upon her in response and the way they fairly spat in her face was a lesson in ill manners.

"I thought you would rather I spoke to you gently than blazed you, as I might have done," the first woman said resignedly.

It may be the atmosphere of the Armory, which draws an overly curious crowd tired for the once of vaudeville, or it may be that Sunday night audiences are used to giving and receiving ill manners. But one thing is certain—if every person who needed it should buy a copy, some enterprising young author would be settled comfortably for life on the proceeds from his new book, "Etiquette at a Public Concert, or Hints to the Evacuee Events Whom Music Hath Not Charms to Soothe."

But this is overmuch space wasted on the unlearned who will not read this, and if they do, will not recognize their own portraits. But indignation will sometimes overflow, and one can only wonder how a leader can go on conducting, and a singer can go on singing, and players can go on playing, in the face of such gross insults. But they have been around the world a good deal trying to educate just such people, and are probably hardened.

And now as to the music. Last night was given one of the best concerts of the entire festival. The orchestra was at its best. The "1812 Overture" (Tschaiakowsky), celebrating the retreat of the French from Moscow and introducing the "Marsellaise" hymn, was one of the best-played numbers of the entire season. It fairly rang with triumph and joy. Two Wagner numbers were given, the "Song of the Rhein Daughters" and the "Entrance of the Gods to Wallhalla," the former especially well played. The delightful little "Chinese Dance" by Tschaiakowsky of the night before was repeated as encore to the overture by the same composer. Of course, the "Blue Danube Waltz" (Strauss) drew a great deal of applause as the popular number of the program. The encore to the "Rheingold" number was the "Rubinstein 'Melody in F,'" which was played in a beautiful manner with the most artistic accentuation.

As for the soloists—Mrs. Edith Moxom Gray, pianist, made her first appearance last night and it is regrettable that she has not appeared oftener. She played the Tschaiakowsky concerto in a big, broad style and showed remarkable force. The brilliancy of her work won immediate appreciation and she was applauded most enthusiastically. Mrs. Gray has been soloist with the symphony and before that with the Chicago, but she has lived the past year in Tacoma, and will probably become a westerner. An awkward and embarrassing oversight of the local management was the failure to provide the pianiste with a seat exactly suited to her.

Jan Van Oordt, violinist, played again and did the Mendelssohn concerto in a beautiful style. One might wish to hear Mr. Van Oordt in a smaller hall, for the Armory is an unfair place to test a violinist. Mr. Van Oordt is thoroughly artistic in his work and did both the adagio and allegro movements in splendid style, but his tone is a little small to fill that large hall. Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, soprano, sang the Michaela aria from "Carmen" and, I thought, awakened to her work better than at any other time of the festival.

The afternoon concert was given over to the "Messiah" which was sung by the large Portland chorus with splendid effect. The Hallelujah chorus, which forms such a grand finale to the famous work which stands at the head of all oratorio compositions, was raved out in imposing volume. A more difficult number which showed careful training on W. H. Boyer's part was "For Unto Us" with its trying variations. The soloists gave some of their best work and the ovation that has greeted the basso, Mr. Middleton, at every appearance, was repeated justly. Mr. Rosenbucker conducted, and the chorus responded well to this change in direction, though there was an occasional slight hitch in the performance because the numbers to be sung did not correspond in the director's and the orchestra's scores. While it is a greater hardship on a chorus to have its conductor changed than on an orchestra which has been playing together for a long time and under different directors and is all made up of professionals, yet the change was made easily and the chorus followed well, though it had not rehearsed with the orchestra.

The general impression left by the festival is one of satisfaction. All the concerts were good and the orchestra itself plays with ease and unity. Five concerts may be rather a large dose for three days, and those who attended all confessed to being tired out. Yet it does not like to miss any for fear of missing something that may be the best. And for such of a good thing, it is likely to dull the appreciation. The festival, it is said by the management, will become an annual affair.

The orchestra will play this evening at Tacoma, and Tuesday and Wednesday evenings in Eugene. By the way, it might be a matter of education and enlightenment for some of the people of Oregon's metropolitan areas to attend a concert, not that small educational tours and such box music better behaved in the audience, and how much more quiet and stationary.

Why Vote for Congressman Wilson? Because he has good reasons. His alignment, seven years ago, in the congressional can be more strictly voted for Oregon than a new man.
