

CARRY MESSAGE FOR GOVERNOR

Fleet-Footed Indians and Y. M. C. A. Youths to Contest in Relay Race.

It is but rarely that the men of the Portland Y. M. C. A. have the opportunity of acting as special dispatch bearers to Governor Chamberlain, but they will be given that opportunity next Saturday, May 2, the occasion of the annual relay race between the Portland association and the Chemawa Indians.

The race last year was won by the Chemawa men and in order to add to the interest this year the Salem Y. M. C. A. is sending in a team. The course is divided into five-mile stretches, and each man will be required to hand the dispatch to his relief. The Portland association men propose to send the Salem starters to the relay Friday to avoid any danger of railway delay Saturday, while the balance will be carried out to their position by automobile.

A. Cortright will make the start from Salem for the Portland men, and John Hessemer will be the recipient of the dispatch at the finish. The balance of the team are: V. Wetterborg, Roy, W. Backus, C. Vosper, A. Ho, W. Low and C. K. K. In the past there are some weak and unpracticed runners among the men, many of them are old hands and can be calculated to bring the Portland colors to the winning line.

Gans Names Conditions.
(United Press Leased Wire.)
San Francisco, April 25.—If Bat Nelson wants a return match with Joe Gans he will have to accept the referee's conditions, laid down today by Ben Seitz, Gans' manager.
Gans will fight Nelson in June before the club offering the biggest inducements, 75 per cent to the winner and 25 per cent to the loser, or winner takes all. If the fight is 20 rounds, we will not insist on a side bet. The weight is to be 123, ring-side, stripped each.

FISHERMAN'S PARADISE OF THE OREGON COUNTRY

AFTERNOON'S CATCH.

The finest fishing stream in Oregon, perhaps in the world, is the Rogue river, which winds through the emerald valleys and verdant-rod hills of southern Oregon. The Rogue river, with its tributaries, is the home of all varieties of western trout, from the small brook trout to the gigantic steelhead.

The fish that inhabit the cold waters of this stream are the gamiest in the world, and put up the best fight for their size of any species known. All varieties take the fly at almost all seasons of the year. Many anglers are successful with both bait and the spoon.

In the upper waters of the Rogue western brook trout, cut-throat and rainbow abound. On some of the upper branches eastern brook trout have been planted and they have thriven wonderfully. In the lower Rogue steelhead, which are taken with a fly up to the length of three feet, rainbow, cut-throat and hybrids of these species are found in abundance. Chinook salmon and silverides can also be found in season, and occasionally will take the fly, though the spoon is usually employed.

One must be an expert angler to be a successful fisherman in the Rogue. The stream is too swift for boats and one must wade to a depth of three or four feet in order to reach by skillful casting a favorite fishing spot of the larger fish. The stream is an exceedingly dangerous one and filled with many holes along its rocky bottom. Many anglers have lost their lives stepping off some ledge into a hole, where they were seized by the rapid current and carried to their death.

At the bottom of some large ripple in midstream, the bigger fish can be found at certain times of the day, and the fisherman who is skilled enough to make a successful cast with flies, always enough to attract the big steelhead or rainbow is sure to have the fight of his life in landing him. It sometimes takes several hours to accomplish the feat, the fish fighting for every inch of the way.

Tributaries Are Full.
Besides the Rogue river proper, Butte creek, Elk creek, Big Butte, South Fork and other tributaries abound with many fish, experience showing the more inaccessible the tributary the greater the chance of securing a heavy catch. The larger fish, however, are found in the main stream.

To the Rogue come fishermen from all parts of the United States to enjoy the sport. Large catches are not the rule, and one must know both the river and the fish to secure the best results. The favorite fishing season is from midsummer to late in the fall. Dams in the Rogue for power plants have interfered to some extent with the fishing, though ladders have been constructed around the obstructions. Below the dam the fishermen at Grants Pass are working havoc with the salmon.

Near the mouth of the Rogue R. D. Hume, known as the lord of the Rogue, has an immense salmon cannery. He operates a hatchery, feeding the young salmon along original lines with remarkable success. Fish hatcheries are also located on the Illinois river and on the upper Rogue near the mouth of Elk creek. From these hatcheries many trout eggs are taken and the outcrop shipped to other states by the bureau of fisheries in spite of the protest of local fishermen who strenuously object to having the fish supply of the Rogue depleted.

Medford Has Champion.
Medford boasts of the champion fisherman of Oregon, perhaps of the coast—W. F. Isaacs. He has fished alongside of nearly all the famous fly casters and anglers of the west and many of the cast and more than held his own. The photographs shown are from catches made by him. One of them reveals a 13-pound rainbow caught with a number 8 fly in the Rogue. The fly is shown sticking in the fish. One of the other pictures is that of an afternoon's catch early last October. It shows a goodly batch of rainbow. But because Mr. Isaacs can cast his fly over a hundred feet and knows the favorite lurking places of the wary trout, it does not follow that everyone appointed. Still, anyone that can cast a fly moderately well is almost sure to find sport enough to justify a long trip to the Rogue.

The wreckman, whose waders slowly were getting on their feet and rubbing sore spots, brushed some dust off the lapel of his coat and muttered to himself: "If they'd have waited a minute I'd told them I was an Indian."

MADDER LEADING BEAVER BATTERS

Portland Catcher Second on Sticking List Among Coast League Players.

When the batting averages of the Pacific Coast league ball players were compiled up to last night some interesting results were revealed, the most important of which was the dropping of Melchior of the Seals from the top to fifth place on the list and the rise of slattery of Oakland and Madden of Portland, both catchers, to first and second positions, respectively. East-erly of Los Angeles also made marked advancement in his batting and is in fourth place on the list and third for the regulars.

Fernoli, the Portland slabster, who has been to bat seven times and made three hits, leads the pitchers, with a percentage of 41. Slattery has a grand percentage of .48 in 24 times at bat. Pearl Casey celebrated the week by dropping several points and instead of 11 players sticking above .350, the Beaver now have eight. But this is not a bad showing, inasmuch as but one of these players is a pitcher.

Following is the batting average of all the players who have made a base hit up to last night, this including yesterday's game:
