WEATHER REPORT

The depression noted over western Montana last evening now appears in the form of a trough of low pressure extending from Alberta southward to Arizona. It retains its energetic character, causing general rains over the entire Pacific northwest during the last 12 hours. The recorded amounts were, however, small except in Alberta. High winds were reported over southeastern Idaho and in southern Nevada. Temperatures were decidedly lower over the plateau, especially in eastern Oregon and southern Idaho. The California high area has drifted northward and now overlies the Oregon coast. It has developed considerably during the interval and is now of pronounced character. The Ohio valley storm area remains practically stationary. It is very energetic and heavy rains have fallen since yesterday over the entire northeastern portion of the country. The rains have been particularly heavy in eastern Pennsylvania, New York and New England. The further development of the high area overlying this region is expected to cause fair weather over this district tonight and Saturday. Frosts are expected tonight, except along the coast, while higher temperatures are probable Saturday.
