WEATHER REPORT

The plateau trough of low pressure has undergone a considerable development during the last 24 hours and is now of pronounced energy. With centers over Utah and northern Idaho, it overspreads the entire inter-mountain region from British Columbia southward to Arizona. Light to moderate general rains have fallen during the last 12 hours over Washington, Oregon, Idaho and portions of California. In the last named state the weather is now clearing, due to the development of a high over the central California coast. Temperatures were somewhat higher over Washington and northern Idaho, and decidedly lower over Nevada and the interior of California. The disturbance over western Nebraska yesterday morning has moved northeastward and is now central over St. Paul, Minnesota; it is rapidly losing energy and appears to be on the verge of extinction. It was, however, sufficiently energetic to cause moderate rains over the Dakotas, Minnesota, Michigan and Illinois during the last 24 hours. Showers are expected over this entire forecast district tonight and Saturday. It will probably be cooler over eastern Washington and northern Idaho tonight.
