

EXTRACT ANIMALS FROM ALASKA'S FROZEN SOIL

Zoological expenditure by Smithsonian Institute Develops Interesting Specimens of Early Annual Life in the Far North.

(Special Dispatch to The Journal.) (Washington Bureau of The Journal.) Washington, D. C., May 16.—A zoological expedition to Alaska, sent out by the Smithsonian institution last season and conducted by C. W. Gilmore of the United States national museum, has brought back besides interesting information, many fragments of bones of early animals, of varieties no longer living there. Although there is not in the lot material from which can be constructed ancient genera hitherto unknown, the specimens show that over the Alaskan fields at a period long before man arrived on them roamed mammoths, several kinds of buffalo, musk oxen, sheep, moose, caribou, horses and bears. Beavers also built their dams along the rivers.

The official report of the trip will be published in the series of "Smithsonian Miscellaneous Collections" at about the same time as the appearance of this article. Ever since the expedition, nearly a century ago, brought back from Alaska a few pieces of skulls and bones of strange extinct beasts, men of science have looked upon that region as a possible source of information concerning the early ancestors of our northern American fauna. Much has been written about it. Little systematic work was done, however, until 1904, when the Smithsonian institution dispatched its first expedition under A. G. Madren. This trip was so fruitful that the institution last season dispatched a second expedition, headed by C. W. Gilmore, which while following a certain itinerary, was to search for the remains of large mammals and to investigate the causes leading to their extinction.

Where the Party Traveled. The party was gone in all about four months, during which nearly the entire length of the Yukon river was covered, and several of its tributaries partly explored. Close upon the river banks, the whole time search was made along the cliffs and in the crevices for the bones of early beasts. Mining camps were also visited on the way for possible traces of significant bones.

The course was laid through Ekagay on the upper part of the river, by train to White Horse, whence a trail led through the mountains to Rampart whence came some ancient bison skulls now in the U. S. national museum. Rampart marked the beginning of the long journey by canoe. For 20 or 40 miles below Rampart the Yukon flows between walls of older rocks, says Mr. Gilmore, "the report sounded as like the firing of a gun that we were started by the sharpness of it."

The party paddled on, however, in search of larger game, and at the mouth of the Nowitna river information gained from an intelligent Indian who had visited the headwaters of the stream on hunting excursions, that he had seen "big horns and other big bones" on the river bars and had picked up the "shank bones" of some large animal, which he had taken into a side trip up the river. Three days up, the traveling turned back and a cache had to be made of all articles not absolutely needed. "Often the water has cut in under the bank," says Mr. Gilmore, "which extends out over the rocks like a great sheet of water, trees growing on these undermined banks frequently lean far over and dip their tops in the water before being carried away. Large blocks of ice, the bank, covered with bushes and trees, cave off into the stream, where they break up and are submerged for a long time. Frequently there hangs down from the top of these undermined banks a mantle of moss which serves as a curtain to hide the destruction the waters have wrought."

The party struggled up the Nowitna river for nine days, hunting for the source of all the pieces of ancient bones found washed down from some place above. No skeletons were met with, and only an occasional deserted winter cabin of a lonely trapper showed that man had ever rambled along the banks or pushed a paddle in the stream. Food began to give out, so that they were forced to turn back before reaching the headwaters. The side trip, however, was not without results, for from nearly every bar searched was secured a fragment of complete element of a skeleton representing such extinct forms as the mammoth, bison and horse.

Stopping at Mouse Point, an Alaskan Indian settlement and trading post, they paddled down into a region of towering cliffs. In places the cliffs are 200 feet high. From them were taken now and then a skull or a tusk or a tooth of some forgotten animal. Anvik was visited, and then the party returned to the mouth of the river. The rest of the journey was on steamer to St. Michael, Nome and finally Seattle.

Results of the Expedition. It was found that the scattered remains of the very early animals, throughout the heart of Alaska not constantly covered by ice and snow, in three quite distinct deposits: First, the black muds accumulated in gulches and the valleys of the smaller streams; second, in the fine elevated clays of early origin, known as the Yukon silts and Jordan's, and third, in the more recent deposits along the banks of streams. These specimens have been either washed out by the process of erosion or dug out by miners in search of gold.

The fossil bones secured came from localities on Bonanza creek, Little Milk creek, the Fallades of the Yukon, the Nowitna river, the Yukagagat river and the Klalishakak river. In connection with the latter, the Yukon, the Fallades and with Elephant Point further north it has been thought that there might be enough ivory in old ivory to make a state of preservation, and that ivory for a good many years have been an important export of Siberia. But the Alaskan remains are not in as good a state of preservation as those of a few years ago. It is said, a man would not take a tusk as a gift. Now they are used to manufacture curios of different kinds.

How the Animals Died. How the ancient animals whose remains are now picked up piece by piece along the rivers died has been a subject of much speculation. Mr. Madren believed they met their end on the shores of glacial lakes, and that their bones were carried off to the present localities by the "flowing" or "creeping" of the muck.

The party paddled on, however, in search of larger game, and at the mouth of the Nowitna river information gained from an intelligent Indian who had visited the headwaters of the stream on hunting excursions, that he had seen "big horns and other big bones" on the river bars and had picked up the "shank bones" of some large animal, which he had taken into a side trip up the river. Three days up, the traveling turned back

TWO FAMOUS DIGNITARIES OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

This remarkable picture was taken when, after a pontifical mass, Cardinal Logue, the primate of all Ireland, and Archbishop Farley walked among the crowds, and the successor to St. Patrick extended a blessing. The picture shows the deep respect with which the assemblage in the street received this blessing.
