WEATHER REPORT

The pressure over the Pacific slope remains practically the same as last evening—high over the central California coast and low over British Columbia. General rains have fallen in consequence over northern California, western Oregon and western Washington during the last 12 hours. Rain has also fallen over eastern Oregon and eastern Washington, but the amounts so far have been inappreciable. Temperatures over the region lying between the Cascades and Sierras on the west and the Rocky mountains on the east are decidedly higher than yesterday morning. Clear skies prevail over the southwest, due to the extensive high area which overspreads that region. Rainfall was general over the entire Mississippi valley and the southwestern states during the last 24 hours.

Showers are expected tonight and Tuesday over this entire forecast district. It will probably be warmer Tuesday over southwestern Oregon and western Washington.
