POOR LO DIVIDES AGAIN

BY FREDERIC J. HASKIN.

(Copyright, 1908, by Frederic J. Haskin.)

Spokane, May 19.—Foot by foot the American Indian has been driven back by the overwhelming, all-conquering tide of a superior civilization. Life by life he has yielded up his place as one of the great families of the human race, until today he has but one acre where he used to have a hundred thousand; today there is only one of him where there used to be a hundred. From the Atlantic westward and from the Pacific eastward two tides of civilization have been forcing him back. Just now the United States government is preparing to take some more of his land and present it to those white American citizens who still desire to be conquerors of the wild. This time it is the lands of the Coeur d'Alene Indian reservation that are to be divided. There are more than half a million acres in it, and only 600 Indians. Uncle Sam is going to give each Indian a quarter section, and the rest he will present to some of his fortunate white nieces and nephews.

But, after all, the Indian will fare pretty well. The average American citizen who possesses 160 acres of tip-top farming land considers himself rather well off. Each Indian on the reservation will be allowed to pick a quarter section before his palatial brethren get a single chance. Therefore the Indians will get the cream of the reservation. If they choose wisely, they will get some 16,000 acres. It is probable that the Indians will choose farming land, and this will leave some 400,000 acres to be divided among white homesteaders, 100,000 of which will be agricultural land. The other 300,000 acres are mountainous and covered with valuable timber. There is much work to be done before the reservation can be thrown open for settlement. The law provides that there shall be three appraisals, and that each one of them must visit every 40-acre section on the reservation. There are 13,500 of these subdivisions. The appraisers will probably drive a stake in the center of each quarter section and walk around it, and the law will have been complied with. The Indians will be given their selections, which must be approved by the secretary of the interior, and then the remainder will be classified, appraised and turned over to the white homesteaders. This, the law provides, shall be thrown open for homestead settlement at such time and in such manner as the president may designate. This "such manner" will be the new form of land lottery, a lottery in which every ticket draws a prize until the prizes are exhausted. In the long run the timbered land will probably prove more valuable than that which is cleared, and it is likely to meet with equal favor with the other. Government Survey. On the reservation the government has a sawmill capable of cutting 10,000 feet of logs a day, with planer and shingle plant, also a gristmill of 35 barrels capacity. These were established years ago and have been a great help to the Indians in improving their lands. The Indians are required to take the logs to the sawmill, where they are cut into lumber. The government supplies all the skilled labor, but the Indians must bring the logs to the mill and take the lumber away. In this way they have secured much of the lumber for their houses and barns at no cost except the labor of securing the logs and hauling the lumber. No charge is made for grinding their grain. The reservation is bounded on the west by the Washington-Idaho state line, which it follows 42 miles south. Its northern extremity is almost due east of Rockford, Washington. Its upper boundary runs east for a few miles and then turns to the southeast, crossing Coeur d'Alene lake and running to the southeast of the town of Harrison, Idaho, seven miles. The reservation comes almost to a point there, and its southeastern boundary runs in a southwestern direction until it strikes the state line again south of Farmington. At its greatest width it is 28 miles wide. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad is building its line through the reservation from the St. Joe river, on its southeast boundary, through to Tekoa. The Oregon Railroad & Navigation company's line from Tekoa to Wallace, Idaho, crosses the reserve from west to east. The St. Joe river and Coeur d'Alene lake furnish water transportation through its greatest length from north to south. Peter Mocktilma is head chief and Bartholomew Mocktilma is an impartial judge and deals out justice without regard to personality. His son, Louis Mocktilma, aged 23 years, is a frequent visitor at Tekoa, and has little or no difficulty in obtaining sufficient liquor to produce intoxication bordering on helplessness. The Indian police take him to the mission where he is ordered imprisoned by his father. When he falls from grace the chief's son receives the same treatment as other Indians who get drunk. Indians Speak English. Most of the Indians speak English and the younger generation are, as a rule, fairly well educated. They receive their education in the Catholic school at DeSmet mission, 13 miles southeast of Tekoa. This school is conducted by the Catholic fathers and the sisters of charity, the former teaching the boys and the latter the girls. Many of the Indian girls have been taught music and there are dozens of pianos owned by Indians. Most of the Indians are industrious and hard workers. Some of them have become wealthy from cultivating large tracts of land and reaping enormous crops of grain. Oats is one of the favorite crops on the reservation and yields a large profit. Louis Antelope is one of the richest Indian farmers. He cultivates 1,000 acres and has a well-kept home. He has large sums of money loaned at interest and has fine teams and machinery. Indian Daniel has 900 acres in cultivation on Rock creek, in the northern part of the reservation. Indian Campbell cultivates 700 acres, and spotted Louis has a $1,500 house on his farm. Louis Michita has 600 acres under cultivation and has one of the best homes on the reservation. He employs white help and has a house near his residence in which the laborers live, much on the same plan as the negroes do in the southern states. Opposed to Opening. The land farmed by the Indians is not owned by them individually. The entire reservation is the joint property of all of them, none of it being allotted in severalty. Several of the head men in the tribe, including Chief Mocktilma and sub-Chief Jarper, are opposed to the opening of the reservation, and insist that the land be retained as a tribal reservation instead of being allotted in severalty. Most of the Indians, however, are anxious for the division of the land, probably not more than a score of them are opposing the allotment and, as they have no authority to stop or hinder the work, their opposition amounts to little. Those members of the tribe who have improved farms will probably select the lands they have under cultivation as their permanent allotment, or as much of it as they sincerely desire. If a married Indian has a family of several children he will thus be enabled to secure a large tract of land in one body, and the largest farms may thus be retained by the Indians who have improved them. A family of five will be allowed 500 acres, so if an Indian and his wife have but three children they may secure a farm this size. The improvements on the lands are the personal property of the Indian who puts them there and will be retained by him, even should he not retain the land. Public allotments are much more orderly affairs today than they were prior to eight years ago. Before that time the "land rush" was the order of the day. Today it is a sort of faro game, but the laws have equal chance with the strong. In the bygone days the homesteaders would gather by the thousands along the border of the land to be opened. Some of them would look over the ground carefully, select their quarter-sections, and get as near them as possible before the opening gun was fired. Then would come the grand rush. Men and women, mounted on the fastest horses would ride at break-neck speed, and if two or three happened to want the same quarter-section there was often blood spilled and money.

New Plan of Allotment. About eight years ago Secretary Hitchcock adopted the present method of allotment, having imported it from New Zealand. It is said that even now it is a case of "many are called but few are chosen." When the reservation around El Reno, Oklahoma, was opened up it was expected that some 60,000 persons would apply for homes. Instead there were 10,000 applicants for the 13,000 farms that were given away. The supreme court of the United States has recently decided a famous case carried there by Lone Wolf, a chief of the Kiowas, that the Indians have only the right of occupation to their lands, and that Congress may do as it sees fit with them. There are now nearly 800,000,000 acres of public lands in the United States, approximately one-half of which is in Alaska. Nearly 200,000,000 acres have been opened up and sold since 1880. Today it has shrunk to 100,000,000 acres. The area of Indian lands amounted to 154,000,000 acres in 1880. Today it has shrunk to 77,000,000 acres, or just about one-half.

Not for 12 years, since Anton Seldi gave us an evening of Wagner, has Detroit enjoyed such a treat and so much musical excellence," was the verdict of the Detroit News upon the appearance there of the New York Symphony orchestra and Walter Damrosch. This famous organization will be heard at the Armory Wednesday evening, June 3 and Thursday afternoon, June 4, under the direction of Louis Steers-Wynn Coman, and the sale of seats for these orchestral concerts will open next Thursday morning, May 23, at the Sherman-Clay music store. The conducting of Walter Damrosch is characterized by his earnestness and while it displays the best characteristics of other great leaders it is yet possessed of a distinct individuality. In connection with Mr. Damrosch's coming it is interesting to note his views as regards the American composer. "Do you know," he is quoted in a recent interview, "I feel a premonition that our great genius will come from the Pacific slope? Why do I think so? That is difficult to say. It may be environment, climate, geographical location—I really cannot say. I do know, however, that on the coast art, culture and appreciation have undergone a wonderful development in recent years."
