Water Carnival on Willamette Attracts Throngs to Bridges and Docks.

Down on the Willamette last night there was a sight worth braving the damp breeze that blew up the river to see. The Willamette may not be altogether lovely in the daylight but transformed into a fairy spectacle with countless small boats and graceful yachts sending shimmering rays of light over the water and marking their course by ripples of fire it was a thing of beauty.

Below the bridges where the big white Charleston lay, a wonderful object stretching out its arms of light in enormous ribbons that now picked out a crowd of sightseers on the bank, now a little motor boat in the river and now one of the other warships in the harbor to above Burnside street, where the sailboats were maneuvering, their graceful masts and sails outlined in Japanese lanterns, the river was alive with boats of every description, all decorated and all filled with laughing people.

Launched in Gay Dress. Commodore H. C. McAllister, chairman of the water carnival, was in the Cruiser Charleston's launch, and directed the review and parade from it. The Charleston had two steam launches in the parade, both handsomely decorated, and with sailors on board burning red fire and discharging fireworks. They made an attractive addition to the carnival.

The gasoline boat Kook, decorated with strings of colored lights, a double row of them around the rail from stern to stern, and with strings of electric globes running to the dinghies in the Japanese lanterns and all adding to the beauty of the scene.

Flag Picked Out by Lights. The searchlights from the warships attracted the most attention of course. Once one from a torpedo boat picked out the big American flag on the top of the Pacific Bridge company's dock, making the banner stand out in the sky as though it were an electric flag. The crowds broke into cheers and there was a great waving of hats, handkerchiefs and banners.

The parade itself was somewhat broken up by the failure of the bridge-tenders to obey the instructions of the county court and open the draws for the passage of the sailing yachts. This interference with the formation of the boats but the steamers, including the fireboat and the United States fisheries steamer Nola, as well as the motor boats and canoes, made the circuit from Swan island to one-half mile above the Madison bridge.

The judges were Hon. J. A. McAllister, Colonel C. E. McDowell, Dr. Harry McKay, Dr. J. A. Stewart and Frank A. Spencer.

Decorations covering the front of the 12-story Wells-Fargo building, on Sixth street, have perhaps caused more favorable comment than any other decorations in the city for the Rose Festival. A total of 650 electric lights are used.

The big building was decorated under direction of its chief engineer, Charles McGill, and Manager Beckwith did not spare expense to make the design effective. A row of mammoth roses is fastened across the whole front of the building at the third story, and in each rose is an electric light. A few stories above is a row of stars of electrical design, and from the roof hangs a mammoth Wells-Fargo company flag, 25 feet long and 12 feet wide, illuminated with a myriad of electric lights.

Boys of electric decorations extend up and down over the face of the skyscraper. The colors of the electric lights and other trimmings are pale green and pink, with a combination of lavender. The entire scheme forms a striking picture at night.

The decorations of the Hotel Portland have also received most favorable comment.
