OLD TIME SPRUCE GUM.

Middle-Aged Man in Vain Seeks in City Delight of His Youth.

From the New York Sun.

"Isn't there any spruce gum on the market nowadays?" asked a middle-aged man in an injured tone. "I don't mean this doctored-up stuff they sell in fancy boxes, but the pure blister gum such as the druggists in northern New York used to have in great piles in their windows 25 years ago.

"That was the genuine article—clear amber globules, varying in size from a marrowfat pea to an English walnut. I tell you it was a pretty shiftless boy that didn't keep his pockets bulging with it.

"Gumming used to be quite an industry up there in the winter time. I remember several old guides who made a very comfortable living out of it.

"They would go off into the woods in the fall and build a shanty of boughs to live in, and stay there all winter, stripping the spruce trees for miles around. The implement was simple—just a long pole with a tin blade at the top to cut the gum off with, and a conical cap underneath to catch it as it fell.

"The blister gum was considered the finest. It required almost no cleaning and could be sold to the druggists for $1 a pound. It would be worth at least twice that now. The retail price was 10 cents an ounce. A woodsman told me that he found 10½ pounds of blister gum one day in a little swamp near Meacham lake. On an average three or four pounds would be a good day's harvest.

"The seam gum could be found in great masses along the cracks in the trees. It was darker and harder, and so was not marketable for chewing purposes, but it was used in the manufacture of various cough drops and so-called cough balsams, besides being valuable for chest plasters, as it acted as a mild stimulant to the skin.

"We boys used to think seam gum was pretty good to chew, too. We used to put it into a burlap bag, bark and all, and hang it over a kettle of boiling water. As the gum melted, it would ooze through the bag into a basin floating on the water.

"Then we'd put the sticky mass on a floured board and knead it up like bread and cut it off in little sticks. I always liked the flavor of it better than that of blister gum. It had the advantage, too, of staying soft after it was once chewed.

"I suppose there must be come place in New York city where you can buy pure spruce gum, but I don't know where it is. The cutting down of the young spruces for pulp wood has greatly lessened the number of gum-producing trees within the last few years.

"Probably the chief cause for the disappearance of spruce gum, though, is the presence on the market of all three manufactured gums. They are cheaper, more convenient to use, and their artificial flavor suits better the degenerate taste of the present day.

"But to my mind nature still turns out the better product. Why, even yet I wake up in the night sometimes with my mouth watering, just from dreaming that I'm about to put my hand under my old school desk and pull out the chew of spruce gum I stuck there 30 years ago."
