But the teamsters' union resented the presence in the parade of any non-union men, and, according to the statement of the secretary of the sign writers' union, W. H. Blevins, proceeded to tear down the signs and decorations which had been placed on the horses and hacks.

The sign writers wanted to fight, but being few in number while the teamsters were many, were unable to do anything. They accordingly left the parade and went back to the office of the Portland Sign company where a formal meeting was held and the union resolved to disband, refusing to be longer associated with any affiliation of which the teamsters' union is a part.

The sign writers were not the only ones who had trouble on the same account. Several of the other unions had
