

PRIZE WINNERS PARADE AT OREGON STATE FAIR

Blooded Stock Exhibition at Salem Calls Forth Comment From Easterners—Fast Pacers Will Try for One Thousand-Dollar Purse Today.

(Special Dispatch to The Journal)
Salem, Or., Sept. 15.—Of chief interest at the Oregon state fair this morning was the monster stock parade participated in by all the prize-winning fat stock at the show. An immense Belgian stallion led the way. Each animal wore a ribbon that indicated his or her award in the prize list, so that the thousands of spectators present could easily distinguish the champion stock.

The display of blooded stock is greater than at any former show at Salem and is believed to be equal to any in America. Nearly every breed is represented and nearly every representative is a top-notch in his class. There is no pari of the show at Salem in which Oregon feels greater pride than the livestock exhibition. It surpasses all previous efforts of eastern visitors without exception express surprise that the west can grow such stock.

Crowds at the fair are not so large today, but still fill the grandstand and other available spaces comfortably. One more day of the splendid weather has been promised, but that the racing record, 3:06 1/4, on this track will be broken this afternoon.

CROWD TAKES SWEET REVENGE ON MAN WHO HOGGED CAR SEAT

The time was yesterday. The place was on an early morning Oregon Electric car at the Jefferson street depot. The occasion was Portland day at the state fair and the resultant wild scramble for seats.

The individual was an American. Every one was sure of that because he said so positively and with some profanity. They were sorry that he was, if his statements were true, and they did not dispute them.

Everybody wanted a seat, and a few got them. The American was one of these. He was a large man of prominent corporeosity, loud voice and porcine visage. He sat in the end of one of the seats, braced his arm out in front of him and defied occupancy of the other half.

The little old man came along hustled by the crowd, with his tired little wife stooping with the weight of years.

"Would you let my wife sit down, please?" he asked of the American.

"Nothing doing," said the American. "You have no right to a whole seat here," said the little old man, a spark of his youth coming back to him, as it does in such cases. The American rose and thrust his face into that of the little old man.

"You can't tell me what I have to do, you. You was sure of that because he said so positively and with some profanity. They were sorry that he was, if his statements were true, and they did not dispute them.

"No," said the man in front, "Just American."

"Must have been hog then," rejoined the inoffensive individual.

"I am glad I am Irish," said the man in front.

"The old fellow overlooked a bet," said the sportive looking man hanging onto the door. "He should have said: 'Sure, I can see you are an American,' and knowing you to be one you are of course a gentleman, and therefore will not allow a lady to stand while you have more seat than you can use."

"He would not have understood it," said the inoffensive man. The American glared but he did not get up. The other men were not little old men. He grew ashamed in a moment and let another woman have half of the seat and when his wife shouldered through the crowd he held her on his lap. His wife must have been an American, too, of the same class. "I thought I never would get through that darned jam," she said between the up and down motion of her gum mastication. "Up at Salem there is a long stretch of dust between Highland station and the fair grounds, just a little hike of something like 20 blocks."

"Is it far from here?" asked the American of no one in particular.

"Just a step," said the man who had said nothing before.

"Men I will walk," said the American and got out of his seat. The man who had not spoken and the sport slipped into the vacant place.

"Poor man," said the sport. "It is only 23 blocks through the dust."

"What," screamed the American, turning back in wild anger. "Did you dub me out of my seat?"

"You lose, Skidoo," said the sport ironically. He was not a little old man and the crowd laughed derisively. The American went out and plumped down into the dust.

"Good-bye, American," called the crowd, sticking its many heads out of the window. The American did not answer.
