MARTÍN'S LAWYER MAKES ELOQUENT PLEA FOR CLIENT

In a speech lasting two hours and a half, Attorney John A. Jeffrey yesterday afternoon made the chief and closday atternoon made the chief and closing speech for Edward H. Martin. He blended sarcasm and pathos in a deverly arranged presentation of the evidence from the point of view of the defense.
All of the time he held the floor he retained the closest interest of a crowded courtroom, and not the least interested, if appearances could be judged, were the 12 men who are to say whether or not Martin is the murderer of Nathan Weiff.

not Martin is the murderer of Nathan Wolff.

That Jeffrey made a strong presentation of the case from his side was admitted by the opposing counsel, and he was warmly congratulated when he had finished by other members of the bar and by the defendant and his wife. He carried his review of the testimony in sequence, and he marshaled his conclusions to more than one eloquent climax. How sound these conclusions will be regarded by the jury remains to be seen, but Jeffrey made the most of the points where the state is weakest and drove home with frequent emphasis; the fact that Martin must be proved guilty beyond reasonable doubt before a verdict of guilty can be given.

Throughout the address Jeffrey clung to the theory that Martin is the victim of detectives who were looking for a man on whom they could fasten the murder of Wolff. He said they proceeded on the preconceived theory that the crime was committed by a "dope fiend," and Martin was selected as the victim because he answered this primary requirement.

From this start the attorney met glances with his attorneys as Fitzgerald went into his analysis of the case, and occasionally he gazed over the crowded courtroom, as though trying to make out what others thought.

Compared to Dr. Jekyll Martin, "said the prosecutor in one of his climaxes," the man who studied at the university, went to West Point and fought for his country. And here, pointing an accussing finger toward the defendant, "we have Mr. Hyde Martin, the morphine fiend and bloodscaked assassin."

Martin did not wince as these words were spoken, or others like them. The only sign he gave was a tilt of his chin or a twitch of his mouth.

The depuity district attorney gave a complete review of the case. It was generally remarked that he handled the evidence in good fashion in fitting one dircumstance to another. He appealed to the jurors not to pick out one thing without considering its relation to other things, and he passed from one to to many strands together and interlace them then you can. That is just what the state has woven.

the murder, and Waldy said he was in Portland for several days after Wolff was killed.

Another point on Waldy was that he testified that Martin was allowed to order drinks without paying for them because the defendant knew the bartender at Erickson's, while Martin testified that he knew no one at that place. Still another point on Waldy was the alleged "identification" of Martin by the logger in the county jail, when Waldy testified that he had recognized the prisoner before that time by seeing him led from the courtroom.

The bloody shirt and the crimson stained collar found in the pawnshop were again compared and the jurors evinced interest. He called on the jury to compare the laindry marks as well, and passed on the story of Max Drey and the shirt. He pointed out that Martin acknowledged buying only one shirt because otherwise he would have had to account for the others. Drey could have no motive for falsely swearing away the life of the defendant, he said, and his story is true, not Martin's.

Then the defendant story about berrowing the gun of Mrs. Grub was reviewed and the excuses he gave about hoboes and then having sold the weapon to a man in the plaza declared unreasonable.

The cravenette and the gloves identified by Mrs. Wolff were taken up. If the cravenette was Martin's, said the speaker, would it appear so bright and new, with the defendant wearing it while he had a fight in a house of ill-fame, visiting saloons in a maudlin condition and then sleeping in the barn with it? There could be no doubt about the gloves, he declared, despite the attempt to befuddle the minds of the jury by alleged expert testimony.

In closing the prosecutor appealed for a verdict that will uphold the law and make safe the lives of men from those who shoot others down in cold blood to rob and to pillage.
