

HOOD RIVER HAS OTHER BIG THINGS THAN RED APPLES

(By a Staff Correspondent.)
Hood River, Or., Oct. 23.—This city is enjoying a period of great prosperity. The returns from the apple crop are large and the trend of improvement is noticeable in all directions. Among the big industries that will bring gold to Hood River's bank deposits is the lumber business, and in this connection it might be said that few people of Portland or in the state of Oregon are aware of the fact that one of the most pleasant pleasure trips is a visit to the sawmill and camps of the Stanley-Smith Lumber company, 11 miles north-west of Hood River. Far up among the red fir and white pine forests this company has established one of the model lumber plants of the Pacific coast.

A Great Mill.
The sawmill has a capacity of 150,000 feet daily. It is what is called a double mill and has seven large bodies. This company has three lumber camps and two planing mills, with $58 men on the payroll. In a seven-months' run they have cut 21,000,000 feet of lumber. The most peculiar thing about this plant is its method of transportation. Flumes are built for miles through the great forest, where eight donkey engines with long wire cables draw the logs from deep canyons or high mountain sides and place them in the flumes where they are floated to the mill. The little stream that supplies the flumes with water and carries the mammoth logs to the mill is still further pressed into service and carries the lumber in another flume for 11 miles to the railroad.

This plant is located at an elevation of 1,500 feet, and for two months in the winter the snow is too deep for logging. This body of timber seems to be almost unlimited. It will average about 50,000 feet per acre and reaches back for many miles from the railroad. This company makes a specialty of bridge and construction timbers and railroad crossties, while their better grades of lumber are shipped largely to Chicago.

Wealth Producer.
To the lumberman the forests have always been a mine, both in the sense of a wealth-producer and in the manner of their exploitation. As long as virgin supplies were in sight, the forests were treated precisely as a mine would be, that is, depleted of all useful material and then abandoned for new fields. There is probably no one problem before the railroads today of more vital concern than that of crosstie production. They have exhausted the supplies in certain regions, and foresee a shortage from present sources.

The magnitude of the problem is indicated by the fact that the annual consumption of ties in the United States for renewals and new lines is about 110,000,000, which requires the timber from over 200,000 acres. If railroad construction timber be included, it means that the railroads strip the forest growth from more than half a million acres annually.

Lumbering is our fourth great industry. Hood River county has from 1,800,000,000 to 1,900,000,000 feet of standing timber. If the reader wants a few days of recreation that recreates he can find some of the best fishing in the state in close connection with the Stanley-Smith camp and a few meals at one of their several logging camps will make one wish he were a lumber jack. The visitor is sure to receive a royal welcome at any of these camps, and as he walks down the steep road that leads back to the town—back to the world—he feels stronger and better and happier for his trip.

WINLOCK RESIDENT COMMITS SUICIDE

(Special Dispatch to The Journal.)
Winlock, Wash., Oct. 22.—Dan Lee, an old resident of Winlock and formerly proprietor of Lee's livery barn, committed suicide early this morning by hanging himself in the barn of J. A. Veness, near his home. The deceased suffered a stroke of paralysis several years ago and had since been in poor health, which is thought to have been the cause of his suicide. The body was found by M. J. Cryderman, who cares for Mr. Veness' horses, when he went to his work about 6 a. m. Lee was about 45 years old and leaves a wife and one daughter. Coroner Harden will hold an inquest this afternoon.

DODD'S PLEA IN GRAMPUS CASE

Lieutenant Claims He Did Best He Could With Poor Facilities.

(United Press Leased Wire.)
Mare Island Navy Yard, Cal., Oct. 23.—Lieutenant Edwin H. Dodd, who was in charge of the submarine flotilla at the navy yard when the disastrous fire occurred September 17, is preparing to defend himself against charges of neglect and improper conduct that is held by the navy department to be responsible for the death of T. G. May, a chief machinist attached to the submarine boat Grampus and of Paul Martin, a local peddler.
Lieutenant Dodd is held to be responsible because he allowed a seething mass of gasoline to pump 75 gallons of gasoline into the bay alongside the quay wall when the boat should have gone into the middle of the stream to discharge it.
The presence of the gasoline on the bay made the water a seething mass of flame when the gasoline on the barge exploded and it was into this mass of fire that May and Martin plunged to death.
The trial will begin Monday. Captain John E. Milton of the receiving ship Independence will act as president of the courtmartial.
Lieutenant Dodd will set up the defense that the yard facilities at Mare Island are so inadequate that the Grampus was unable to leave the quay wall to pump out her gasoline. The equipment department, he will say, was busy charging the batteries of the boat and finished but a few minutes before the boat was ready to enter under way.
Lieutenant Dodd is one of the most popular officers here.

Mill Workers to Organize.
(Special Dispatch to The Journal.)
Charlotte, N. C., Oct. 22.—Overseas, chief engineers and master mechanics of the leading textile mills throughout the southern territory met for a two day session in this city today for the purpose of organizing a permanent association. The proposed organization is in no sense to be trade union, but on the other hand will work in close harmony and relationship with the manufacturers' association for the upbuilding of the textile industry in the south.

France's New Marine Minister.
(United Press Leased Wire.)
Paris, Oct. 22.—The announcement that Alfred Picard has been appointed minister of marine is received with great satisfaction. There is little sympathy for the retiring minister of marine, M. Thompson. M. Picard was chief commissioner of the Paris exposition in 1904 and is well known as a successful railroad man. He is 64 years of age and was thought to have finished his public career. He is a writer of considerable ability.
