Tuberculosis Killed 160,000 Last Year

So Secretary Cortelyou Told the International Tuberculosis Congress

The International Tuberculosis congress, recently held in Washington, has given a world of facts concerning the greatest scourge ever inflicted upon the race.

When we stop to consider that a million lives will be saved annually to the world by the prevention and cure of this disease, we can form some idea of the importance and magnitude of the subject considered by this congress.

We now know that there are millions of persons living and moving about in everyday life, who are suffering from Tuberculosis in one form or another.

It is estimated that 160,000 persons die annually in the United States from Consumption, or Tuberculosis, and from any way we look at it this is a dreadful figure to consider.

If this tremendous loss to the country occurred annually by the destruction of the population of some splendid city of 160,000 from some preventable cause, all the strength and power of the government would be stretched forth to put a stop to the calamity; yet quietly and insidiously Tuberculosis is yearly effecting this fearful loss of life and the government scarcely recognizes the fact.

In every city and considerable village in the United States there should be provided, under authority of law, an organization for the prevention and cure of Tuberculosis under the supervision of medical men.

Of great importance is the care that should be given to children during their school years. Defective eyesight, bad teeth, scrofula and enlarged tonsils lead to weakened constitutions, if neglected.
