THE American campaign for the preservation of child life is one of the great movements of the time. The wisdom of this crusade is apparent, because anything that safeguards the child of to-day is a positive gain for the virility of the man of to-morrow. Whatever is done to foster youth is really insurance against incompetency in age. In this, the greatest of nations, a wonderful work is being done to protect the health and develop the acumen of the coming generation. A great organization is working to place orphan children in private homes. Social and industrial societies are aiding the state to enforce child-labor laws. Every large city has one or more associations for the protection of children. Playgrounds have been built throughout the country at a cost of millions. Libraries have been opened for the exclusive use of little folks. Philanthropic people are teaching thousands of poor children how to improve home life. A children's theater is operated with marvelous success in New York, and a children's church has been opened in Chicago. Juvenile delinquents are now tried in courts of their own. Incurable children have been redeemed by allowing them to operate self-governing republics, and science is saving babies and children from needless death.
