As the men were leaving the place two monkeys, carried in an overcoat pocket of one of the men, got into a fight. Their jabbering the inspectors saw could be heard half a block. Segel and his companion, with their suspicions confirmed in this unexpected manner, escorted the two men to the custom house. There it was found they carried between them six small monkeys.

Until late in the afternoon Mr. Smyth had to act as attendant to the six noisy monkeys, while his men scoured to find quarters for them until they can be used as "evidence" should their seizure result in a charge of smuggling.

SCRAPPO THE MONK BETRAYS SMUGGLER

New York, March 20.—The mistake of putting two monkeys in the same pocket caused two men to be stopped by the customs authorities as they were leaving the Hamburg-American liner Prinz Eitel Friedrich, Pier 1, North river. When searched a dozen chattering monkeys were found on them.

For some time Deputy Surveyor George Smyth has suspected that too many small animals were being smuggled into port by the men employed on vessels in the South American trade. He assigned inspectors Segel and Gillespie to watch the Prinz Eitel Friedrich, which had just arrived. They declare that in the early afternoon they saw two men leave the steamer with bulging pockets and go to a saloon on the pier.
