The Waning Army.

From the New York Tribune.

The annual gathering of the Grand Army of the Republic differe from most other great popular gatherings in an essential and pathetic respect. It is the meeting of a dying body, which grows inevitably smaller year by year.

Conventions of other bodies report increases of membership and growth in numbers and strength. Not so the veterans of the conflict which is still preminently called The War. Their report is invariably one of losses, of diminishing numbers, of progress toward ultimate, and now, indeed, not very remote, extinction.

The circumstance invests the encamp-ment with pathos, and perhaps it also strengthens the bends of attraction strengthens the bends of attraction which hold the veterans together and which draw them to their revalons.

Passions, too, are waning in the lapse of years, and that is cause for rejoicing. It is not because the actual combatants are dying and disappearing that the animosities which once prevailed ere also vanishing. Rather is it because of the increasing perspective of history and of the practical and experimental demonstration of the benefits to all parts of the nation which proceeded from the reestablishment and perpetual confirmation of the Union.
