Why the Gentleman From Oakland Bought in Laurelhurst

Recently a prominent railroad man of Oakland, Cal., coming to live in Portland, bought a home site in LAURELHURST.

He not only found, he declared, that LAURELHURST was the most charming and satisfying residential section of Portland, but that the LAURELHURST prices, all things considered, were the lowest being, in fact, much lower than for any Oakland property which can be compared with LAURELHURST.

Persons familiar with values in other cities always show great appreciation of LAURELHURST.

STRICKEN WHILE ON HONEYMOON, HE DIES

The death of Paul Whallon, meter expert for the Portland Railway, Light & Power company, which occurred Friday, is surrounded by a number of unusually sad circumstances, aside from the fact that Mr. Whallon was in the prime of young manhood.

Since July 1, 1899, Mr. Whallon had been in Portland, and had planned his wedding and a visit to his parents in Iowa at Thanksgiving time.

At Seattle sudden illness forced the couple to return to Portland and Mr. Whallon was taken to the Good Samaritan hospital where typhoid and pneumonia was discovered in advanced stages.

Death won after a struggle of 19 days. Instead of the visit at the old home the father is coming after the body of his boy, it being expected that he will arrive in Portland this evening.
