Long Season With Plenty of Birds in Sight Opens September 1.

Multnomah, Clatsop and county sportsmen are making great preparations for the opening of the duck shooting season next Friday, the first day of September. From that day until January 15, the lowlands will echo with the report of the shotgun and the splash of the falling bird. From the county clerk of Multnomah comes the report that the hunting licenses so far issued approximate 2200, far less than last year at this particular time.

The limit each week is 35 ducks. Shooters are permitted under the law to sell their bags for a period of one month, from November 15 to December 15.

Feeding in the duck preserves down the river began in some places as early as August 1, while others waited un-til the middle of the month to set out their corn and wheat. Already birds are beginning to arrive, the "early sprigs" have been noticed in considerable numbers already. Indications this year are that woodducks and early mailards and teal will fly in larger numbers than usual. The advance guard of these varieties has already been noticed and with it comes the prediction that lowland game will be more plen-tiful than in any season in years.

From the Alaskan coast have drifted reports that there are more ducks than in years, and when the storms drive them south, the Portland sportsmen have hopes of plenty of shooting late in September or early in October.

The first day is always a busy one for duck shooters and it is likely that the duck preserves on Deer and Sauvies islands and the Willamette and Columbia river sloughs will swarm with
