C. B. Manning. Manning at first said he could not convict a man in a case where the death penalty was involved... (Text continues with legal proceedings.)

"Would it be possible for circumstantial evidence alone to convince you of the guilt of the defendant?" (Text contains a question from the court.)

"I think so, if it is very strong." (Text provides a response to the court's question.)

Judge Bordwell asked Manning if he could convict in a case where the evidence though conclusive, was entirely circumstantial. (Text reports on Judge Bordwell's question.)

"I would convict a man of horse-stealing on that evidence, but I would not want to where it meant death." (Text includes a quote from Judge Bordwell.)

Later he modified his statement, saying he was willing to accept circumstantial evidence when reinforced by direct, and he was finally passed for cause by the state. (Text reports on Judge Bordwell's final decision.)

Fredericks then questioned F. D. Green, a Pomona rancher. He had no scruples against the death penalty nor against circumstantial evidence. (Text reports on the testimony of F. D. Green.)

All that I would want would be a complete and unbreakable chain of evidence," he said, "and then I would convict." (Text includes a quote from F. D. Green.)

The state then passed him for cause and the luncheon recess was ordered. (Text reports on the court's decision.)
