

RIVAL COMPANIES IN WAR FOR FISH; BOATMEN PROFIT

Sanborn-Cutting Company and Union Cooperative People Fall Out When Latter Give More Money for Salmon.

Special to The Journal. — Only seven days of the fishing season left and controversy has sprung up between two rival packing companies over the salmon catches of the local fishermen, which threaten to terminate in the courts.

The rivalry began at the opening of the fishing season, when the Union Cooperative Packing company of Astoria offered $1.00 a pound for silver-sided fish after the Sanborn-Cutting company owners of a cannery at Astoria had opened the market at 2 1/2 cents. Next day all the fishermen turned their catches over to a representative of the Co-Operative company, who on his own account offered a further inducement by taking up the catches with his launch and saving the men the trouble of bringing them to the dock, and consequently shipped tons where the Sanborn-Cutting representative shipped pounds.

Weekly Adjusted Are Issued.

To regain their lost patronage, the Sanborn-Cutting people went quickly to work, through representatives, and leased nearly all of the land along either side of the river and Saturday served notice on the fishermen that if they wished to retain their fishing grounds they must patronize the company. This the fishermen refused to do and are now being treated to the advice of Mr. Smith, attorney for the Co-Operative cannery, taking refuge in a clause of the fishing laws which allows them to anchor nets in a "V" shape in the center of the stream, regardless of who owns the land on the river bank.

Last week, notices posted at the mouth of the Necanicum river by the Sanborn-Cutting company, prohibiting fishing there without the company's consent, were removed by injunction by the Co-Operative people on the contention that the grounds there belong to the government and are open to all for fishing purposes.

Riverside Run a Huge One.

During the past 10 days the run of silver-sided fish has eclipsed all previous records at this place and the heavy rains of the last 24 hours threaten a freshet on the river, which will bring the fish in larger schools than ever, and the fight between the two canneries over the enormous catches will undoubtedly become more strenuous and may involve some of the local fishermen, who are inclined to be incensed at the action of the Sanborn-Cutting company in giving them the alternative of losing what they have considered for years their rightful fishing grounds, or patronizing the company.

OPENING CONCERT RECEIVES OVATION

Portland Symphony Orchestra Delights Audience at Heilig — Musical Treat.

J. L. W.

The opening concert of the new Portland Symphony Orchestra at the Heilig theatre yesterday afternoon was really a musical treat and those who deserted their cheerful firesides for the concert felt more than repaid for venturing out in the howling rain storm. And several hundred braved the elements, because the theatre, while not packed, was nearly filled. The size of the audience, under such circumstances, demonstrated that Portland contains enough music lovers to make occasional symphony concerts self-sustaining.

Conductor Mose Christensen proved a good director, thoroughly familiar with the scores, and apparently fully confident that the performers before him were ready to respond promptly and correctly to every beat of the baton.

Thanks Audience.

At the close of the concert and after prolonged applause, Mr. Christensen stepped to the footlights and, for himself and the orchestra, thanked the audience for their display of enthusiasm and kind encouragement, saying the size of the audience and the interest displayed convinced him that Portland really wants a symphony orchestra, and that such an organization will be supported.

The program opened with Dvorak's "New World" symphony, which formed the first part of the program. Each of the three movements was splendidly rendered, and the largo with its solo for English horn, as distinctly read as by any of the visiting orchestras of established reputations. The intonation was perfect, which means some praise for the horn players, more than often a sore spot in the big orchestras. Those not acquainted with the instrumentation might be interested to know that the English horn is a double reeded instrument of the above family.

Lighter Composition.

The French horn belongs to the brass family and the most delicate of them all when it comes to tone production.

The second part of the program was devoted to lighter compositions, including an air for strings, by Mach-Wilhelm; Intermezzo, "Elegante," from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann," and Gille's brilliant entire acts gavotte. For encore after the Offenbach Intermezzo, the orchestra gave Dvorak's "Humoresque," in which the strings and horns again showed up to fine advantage.

The most stirring number of the program, perhaps, and particularly fitting for the close, was Massenet's suite, "Scenes Napolitaines." It had all the life and action the composer intended.

The next concert will be given on the afternoon of Sunday, December 21, when Carl Denton will be the conductor.
