LITTLE STORIES OF THE MAT

BY LLOYD KENYON JONES

Here and there in those precipitous crags are bare spots that indicate the location of mines-and every mine has its hero. At the Tom Boy mine was a strong boy known as de Wilde-and the Smuggler-Union, Liberty Bell, and Revenue Virginius miners wanted to find an opponent who could teach de Wilde how to take a mat joke.

About this time there drifted into the camp a fellow known as Carl Temple. and Carl and the Belgian had pulled a rough house match that had ended unsatisfactorily.

The event was to be staged in the baseball park, following a game between the Telluride Tigers and the Montrose Monsters, in which Telluride A got trimmed.

In order to make the gong ring every time the crowd had to march out after the ball game and pass through the gate again for the matfest-and every mother's son toted a six-gun and a 98-proof breath-which is an evil com-bination for any gathering in the hills. The machine men, the single-jackers, the double-jackers, the carpenters, muckers, tram men, shift bosses, and all were, there, and there was more kale placed on the outcome than a senator would need to get into congress. The Belgian, de Wilde, and the American, Temple, eased up to one an -50 other after, the fashion of poorly fed roosters slammed into the cockpit. They didn't want to wrestle-forgot all their bad blood-and suffered from a case of chilled Tribles.

The grandstand bristled with Colts. The referee remembered the bets.

"First, I call all bets off," he announced, "and then, Temple gets the match.

In his agitation de Wilde had forgotten about the personal bet between Temple and himself. He hurried away to dress, and when he got back to view the scene of his disaster Temple was beating it down the street with the huge tarpaulin packed on his shoulders. "Hey!" de Wilde shouted. "Schtopome back here. Bets is off, don't they? Fairst you get a friend to turn a rope over my feets and vin der match which ain't begun-and now you cop der mat. Come back. If you don't
