

Lipman, Wolfe & Co.--Interesting Sales Throughout the Store

Postscript

—Have you ever read that bit of French American history that deals with dower chests? True, history concerns itself with cherry trees, burnt oak cakes, key-holes and garters—so, why not with dower chests? It was during that romantic period when New Orleans was a French city, and daring French voyageurs ranged the woodlands of the Middle West. Into this paradise of almost unrelieved masculinity good King Louis sent a bevy of pretty girls, each with a mysterious dower chest which was to procure for her a good French husband.

—I am not certain just what success this match-making scheme attained, but I hope that the courageous little maids with the dower chests lived happily ever after to drink the health of the King of France.

—On the fifth floor, at Lipman, Wolfe & Co.'s I found a fascinating dower chest which looked fit to contain any feminine secret of state. It was made of polished red cedar, and bound with broad brass bands, which were held in place with copper pegs. A massive and dignified affair it was—yet not too large to look well in one's room—for, surely, one would hesitate to thrust such a splendid thing into a garret.

—There were smaller chests, too, of the useful variety known as "shirt waist boxes," solid and strong enough to last a lifetime, and beautiful enough, with their polished sides, to grace the prettiest room.

—Perhaps the most marked tendency of those sartorial mandates which keep us ever on the alert is the decided return of the waist line. For some time we have been deprived of this important feature, or else we have suffered it to escape from its natural place and pretend it was several inches higher up than it was wont to be. However, our friends the dress-makers, have it well in hand again, and the result is the Norfolk jacket, the belted coat and the dress with the girdle. Scarcely a garment appears which does not herald its up-to-date-ness by defining its waist line in some way. Even in Sweaterdom, whither we have always turned in search of ease unbiased by style, we find the Norfolk—belt, straps, military collar and all. And a most attractive garment it makes, too. A great many of us will like it "just for a change," in plain colors, and also in "Blazer" stripes, in the woman's sweater department on the fourth floor.

—The Navajo Rugs which have attained such a world wide popularity bid fair to vanish from the market. Especially in the blissfully ignorant East, where Indians and reservations have found a large place in song and story—the demand for Indian rugs is furious. The beautiful gray ones, which blend so artistically with the ordinary furnishings of the home, are the most sought after. The bold, startling red ones are really more savage in appearance, but they strike a key that is too high in color for the average room.

—By actually visiting the big reservations and penetrating to the remote regions where the industrious squaw—unspoiled by thoughts of suffrage—weaves her wares, the rug-buyer was able to secure a considerable collection of these gray rugs, together with plenty of the red ones, in the best designs. To be had at remarkably low prices, and in a great variety of sizes, in the rug department on the fifth floor.
