EXPLAINS OPPOSITION TO DEATH PENALTY

In his lecture against capital punishment at Christensen's hall last night, John A. Jeffrey remarked upon the fact that capital punishment had been abolished in Washington, just across the Columbia, and wondered if those who believe in cruelty as a deterrent for crime would not be afraid to live so near a place where legal murder did not exist. He asked if anybody expected a general outbreak of murder to follow the repeal of that law in the state of Washington. Mr. Jeffrey said that he had tried about 30 murder cases and never in all his experience had he seen the typical, cold blooded murderer of the story books.

"Concerning the Humphrey brothers," said the speaker, "I saw the statement every day that they were hardened criminals and monsters. Not one of these statements is true. They were never charged with a crime in the world except the murder of Mrs. Griffith. She lived out on a farm; the motive of the murder was robbery, but unless someone had personal knowledge of the sale of her property, no one knew of it except through a country paper, which gave no account of the sale until the day before the murder was committed and it would not have been revealed until afterward, where Mrs. Griffith lived."

Mr. Jeffrey told the story of a man and a dog that were blown, or supposed to have been, blown to pieces in the man's garden by dynamite. In order to give the man "Christian burial" and prevent the dog from being buried in consecrated ground, an expert at $60 a day was hired to separate the infinitesimal fragments of the man's body from that of the dog. A result of his labors showed a neat little pile of remains labeled "dog" and a larger pile said to be the man. "The little pile was buried in the garden, the other was on its way for Christian burial when the dog, alive and well, showed up, coming home, having escaped dissection by the dynamite.
