Throughout the winter the short www. wecame very popular; in fact, so much so that the full length wraps were practically abandoned, leaving us with modified evening wraps to wear in the spring and summer. In these may be found some charming designs developed in rich brocade or matelasse to wear over the evening gown, and others made of ratine, dark satin, or dark matelasse, suitable for wear over the thin frock at the summer resort or with the afternoon gown.

These short wraps are also being worn on the street, but the coloring is subdued and the material practical, Here in the sketch is represented a most attractive model of gray cheviot corge with a fine stripe of darker gray. It is cut large and roomy across the oulders, and has wide sleeves set into dropped armholes under a corded

The fronts cross diagonally and then slope down the sides, rounding off in back. The draping of the lower part of the coat is laid in two folds and caught under the diagonal slash of the fastening. The neck is finished with a broad turned down collar of white ratine and rows of white enamel ball buttons are arranged at the line of closing and up the outside of the sleeves In cutting the coat the material is laid so that the stripes of the body portion run up and down. The sleeves have the stripes running lengthwise, but the deep set on cuffs are arranged with the stripes running around them. In navy or any dark shade of ratine the same design can be attractively developed for a traveling or motor coat, while in brocaded or plain satin it will make a lovely evening wrap.

ing. He said in part "Youth is the ex-pression of life, and all life comes from God. Man is a vessel, a receptacle of life, and as he broadens the stream flowing into him and gives it fullest outlet in love and use he cooperates with God and achieves sternal youth. "True, man may outgrow the body; when it is no longer of service to him he sheds it as an outworn coat, and then, according to the uses he has served and continues to serve, is the beauty of youth visible in him. "Love is the elixir of youth. In the degree in which any man receives and expresses a love of some use, real youth stays with him. To grow in love and wisdom is to grow young, even here, where the real man is cloaked with a body, for as he grows wise he perceives the value of a sound body through which he may express himself. Desir-ing a sound body he adapts, his habits to modes of living which give it to him. In a sound body man may live a youthditions? An unselfish love going out is to be high. Conjugal love, parental love, neighborly love, all good loves tend to retain the youth of the body. A love of use expressed in wise statesmanship, in effort for civic improvement, in honest business methods, in prudently and lovingly ordering a home, in the rearing of children, in a word, in the desire to serve one's fellowman, gives to man or woman a youthful bodily vigor which may reach twice three score and ten. It is the love of the inner man which keeps him in the fragrance of youth."
