AN IMMORTAL CORPORATION

There may be some doubts as to the immortality of the soul, but there are none about the immortality of the corporation.

The Hudson Bay company, which did business in the north wilderness of America in the seventeenth century, is establishing huge department stores in the same region, now rapidly settling in the twentieth century.

Few tales appeal more strongly to the imagination than the sober history of this company. It is a story of strong men, of their wild adventures in savage lands, where law's abode was in the hip pocket, of their grim purpose holding on for a quarter of a thousand years, of the grip of the Anglo-Saxon, set and unloosed from generation to generation.

It was Charles II of England who in 1670 gave to "the governor and company of merchants-adventurers trading into Hudson's Bay" their rights to trade in and to govern an empire of field, forest and water of whose extent they had no conception.

It was in a day when unexplored lands were given away with a free hand and a royal largesse; in a day when the pope drew a line on the globe and gave all on one side to Spain and all on the other to Portugal.

The hardy English pioneers threaded their way into the vast, still north, built their lonely stockades, trapped and hunted in the unhampered freedom of the new world, fought and traded with the Indians.

For a while this advance guard of English civilization had a hard contest with their traditional enemies, the French, who disputed their territory, until the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, by which France resigned her claims.

Then followed what was perhaps a fiercer war, a war with their competitors, fierce and bloody as a Kentucky feud. This closed in 1811 with a merger with the Northwest company.

Thus through years, centuries, the Hudson Bay company has hung on; and now comes a curious adaptation of its oldtime enterprise to modern conditions. It is establishing a chain of department stores throughout the newly developed Canadian territory.

Few of us realize with what tremendous rapidity northwest Canada is being brought under cultivation. Trainloads of settlers during the summer come from Minneapolis. Shiploads come from England. Vast farms are being improved. Cities are upspringing like mushrooms.

The Hudson Bay company has already opened a store in Vancouver, and represents a capital of $1,000,000. Another is building in Victoria, will cost the newspapers, at a cost of $4,000,000. Still another, at Seattle, will cost $1,250,000. Winnipeg will have a $7,000,000 store. There will be one at Edmonton.

The value of this private enterprise in the perilous days of frontier life is unquestioned. It remains to be seen how it will adjust itself, and what will be the people's attitude toward it in these days of growing distrust toward privately owned wealth units.

Charitable and relief organizations of the city have perfected plans for a joint application bureau, to be located in the offices of the Municipal Free Employment bureau, First and Taylor streets. It is intended to make this office an application and reference bureau, to which people desiring assistance may apply and receive the proper directions as to which specific charitable organization will handle their case.

All cases of homeless women will be referred to the Volunteers of America, the Associated Charities will look after destitute families of the city, and the Salvation Army will care for men. It is hoped that this five months' survey will give an accurate idea of Portland's homeless population. The figures being obtained, a campaign will no doubt be inaugurated for a municipal lodging house.
