GOVERNMENT ISSUES

ORDERS TO INCREASE CHINOOK'S CAPACITY
Major McIndoe Instructed to Begin Work of Installing 2 New Pumps at Once.

The government's initial compliance with the campaign to increase dredging capacity on the Columbia river bar came in the form of a telegram this morning to Major James F. McIndoe, district government engineer, instructing him to install two additional pumps on the dredger Chinook.

Plans for 24 inch pumps will be prepared by the district engineer subject to approval by the department at Washington, and effort will be made to have them ready for use by the time the dredger goes back to work on the bar next spring.

The Chinook is now equipped with two 20 inch pumps. Two additional 24 inch pumps will greatly increase the capacity, especially if it is found possible to increase the draft.

In quiet weather, to use all four simultaneously.

Any increase in dredging capacity means that the time will be made shorter until the bar shall be removed and the channel deepened to admit the largest ships to the Columbia river.

The telegram from Washington is also understood to have conveyed authority for repairs on the Chinook aggregating about $15,000, in line with recommendations made some time ago by Major McIndoe.

The rumor which has persisted in circulation that either Colonel Burr or the Washington office, or Colonel Harry Taylor, government engineer, would be appointed as successor to Major McIndoe, who leaves to take charge of government engineering work in the Philippines December 1, received a double negation this morning.

A wire from Washington received by The Journal said that neither had been appointed as successor to Major McIndoe, and Major McIndoe, when questioned, said that neither man had been mentioned to him as his successor when he was in Washington recently.

"I was told who my successor would be, but it was not the name of either man mentioned," said Major McIndoe.

Snags for $5100 Damages. Because a splinter of steel from a wedge he was using put out his eye John Lisk suing R. A. Nelbauer, a farmer near Gresham, for $5100 damages.

The trial is in progress before Circuit Judge Cleston. Lisk was hired by Nelbauer as a farm hand and was splitting a log when injured.

Nelbauer alleges that he told Lisk to watch the wedge and let him know if it splintered as it was warranted not to splinter by the man who sold it to him.
