Oregon Electric trains hereafter will make flag stops midway between the stations of Metzger and Nesmith, according to a ruling of the state railroad commission, acceded to by the company yesterday. People living between the two settlements petitioned the commission that to reach the stations they had to cross a dangerous trestle. The company, in defending itself, told the commission there are too many stops now and people of Portland have been demanding more rapid service, which is hard to maintain with so many stops. It is probable that a platform will be built until such time as a regular station is needed.

From the Boston Transcript. Professor Spinazzofa, director general of the excavations at Pompeli, scouts the idea that the port of Pompeil has been discovered after all. He points out that not only are seawater marks frequently found on stone foundations in the vicinity of the shore, but that a large quantity of wooden upright posts, supposed to be the masts of ships, are, as a matter of fact, the remains of a plantation of cypress. He discredits the belief in the existence of an ancient port.

Professor Spinazzola announces that he intends to make the chief feature of his term of office the discovery and and balconies in the buried buildings, in contrast merely to the ground floor
