Mrs. Many breeds of egg producing fowls Kelly left home two months ago for have been presented to the poultry duct. The affected birds should be Los Gatos to recuperate from nervous fanciers of the United States during the past decade, but never in the his- from all undue excitement. Doctor tory of poultry breeding has any breed or strain jumped into popular favor as Oakland, Cal., by Judge Harris for rapidly as the Silver Campine (pronounced Campeen.) failure to pay his wife alimony of $300 This gain in popularity by the Sila month. Mrs. Westphal' told the court that Westphal's alleged persecuver Campine has not been created by artificial means, nor has it been creartificial me ated by extensive or sensational ad- one half drop tincture of aconite root vertising, but is the result of more people from year to year realizing the full merits and value of this breed. It is also very noticeable that the type and color of the bird is improving and it is particularly noticeable that fewer poor Campines are entering the show year to year.

That at one time or another the race came from the shores of the Mediterranean there can be little doubt. But the origin of ancient breeds we cannot with certainty, as the lapse of time and lack of records make it impossible to trace their wanderings, 'so the exact origin of the ancient Campine is hidden in the past. But coming to more modern times, the bird that is now known as the Silver Campine first received official recognition in Belgium, where they are as extensively raised for egg production as the Leghorns are in America. The name Campine is taken from the sandy plains of La Campine in Belgium. The first selective work with the Campines was begun about 1865 by a Mr. Van Horn, who was station master of St. Lierre at Turnhout, Belgium, and made a hobby of Campines for eggs and often his best cocks and even his pullets, thus improving their stock from a breeder's standpoint. Shortly after this time, this breed was introsaddle and resorted to double mating to obtain this result. Fortunately, however, among the English breeders, a few were found who realized the future the breed held if this difficulty could be overcome. These breeders decided to sever connections with the Belgian standard and destroyed the Drysdale river mission lish Campine, which would permit the male to carry the identical plumage of the female and thus do away with been ordered by the White Star line the necessity for the separate matings. The scheme was carried through with the utmost success.
