Spalding and Parish and Dr. Dart, the Indian agent, returned to Astoria on board the Columbia in the latter part of September. On the return of the Columbia to Port Orford she brought Samuel Culver to act as Indian agent.

Next month both the Columbia and Sea Gull were chartered by the government to take Colonel Silas Casey and his troops consisting of cavalry and artillery to Port Orford. The Sea Gull brought Company C of the First Dragoons with 36 horses and 46 mules from Benicia. This company was under the command of Lieutenants Stanton and Stoneman, Colonel Casey, who had arrived a few days previously on board the Columbia chartered the Sea Gull to convey the troops to the mouth of the Coquille river, while Lieutenant Stanton with two whale boats prepared to ascend the Coquille river in pursuit of Indiana who were still hostile. The troops were landed from the Sea Gull although one boat load was overturned, but before all the troops were landed a heavy gale made the sea so rough the Sea Gull anchored and waited for morning to land the rest. Next morning the storm was more severe so the Sea Gull had to recharged the rest of the troops, who started by land for the Coquille river. Lieutenant Stoneman built a block house on the bluffs which commanded the Indian village and the river. The Indians were entirely unacquainted with firearms and when the howitzers threw their shells into the Indian village they were terrified. They fled in their canoes up the river and were pursued by the troops in the two whale boats. The Indians were so severely punished by the troops that
