Who Was She?

Portland, Sept. 26 .- To the Editor of The Journal - A few years ago a woman who had obtained national prominence as an advocate of woman suffrage died in poverty and almost friendless. After attaining an envied position as an advocate of woman's ights she was employed by the liquor nterests to fight prohibition. After one or two campaigns in behalf of the saloon interests she died penniless and forsaken. I believe just before death she brought suit against the National Liquor association for recompense, but if I remember rightly, failed to recover. Her last statement was in almost the words of Shakespeare's character: "If I had continued to serve women, children and humanity as interests. I would not now be deserted in my old age." Can you give me the name of this It has escaped my recollection, but her death occurred but a few years ago, and was published in the papers throughout the nation, JOHN INSLEY.
