By L F. Saunders There are many novel varieties rabbitries, from the Coal Cellar, to the more ostentatious, buildings designed for fanciers. If you are lucky enough to have a disused outhouse or stable there will be little expense in building. The hutches can be made single of uniform size, or in tiers of two or three, according to height, those built in tiers are recommended. Allow me to state, here if the rabbitry is situated in a stable the whole of the building should be used, fumes rising from horses, or cattle, not only make it very difficult to keep the rabbit in good coat, but is positively dangerous Belgians need more room than most other varieties, owing to their restlessness and the exercise required to produce the long slender shape. Without question the open front hutches are the correct thing. A point which makes a rabbitry not only pleasant to its owner, but also impressive to visitors is uniformity. For general purposes, hutches should 38 fr in tiers of six feet in length two feet two inches wide and 20 inches deep.
