Samuel Hill Just Had to Talk Roads

So Big Crowd at East Side Library Stereopticon Man Unable to Work Machine, 200 Turned Away.

The east side branch library, East Eleventh and Alder streets, wasn't half big enough to hold the crowd that turned out to hear Samuel Hill, the good roads apostle, talk on "Floral Culture and Scenery of Oregon," last night. They sat in the aisles; they stood up all over the place; they crowded onto the platform; they made it almost impossible for the stereopticon man to work the slides; and 200 persons went home disappointed, unable to get in. The lecture was given under the auspices of the Hawthorne District Rose association. Although Mr. Hill's subject was of floral and faunal sort he just couldn't resist the temptation to talk on good roads and he did so in "his usual straight-from-the-shoulder way. "I am tired of hearing of these eulogies of so-called road builders," he told his audience, "when I know for a sioner of public utilities, to abolish fact that there are only four men who the present efficiency system under know how to build a road right in this which city employes are working was entire country.
