Beauty Chat

BY LILLIAN RUSSELL

Are You a Contortionist?
SOME one has said that it is possible to judge a man by what he eats. It is certainly possible to classify both men and women by the way they eat and their table postures. One might assume that many of the girls to be seen in any restaurant are attempting to pose as contortionists. They certainly succeed in twisting their limbs and bodies into most ungraceful and awkward positions. It is not a pretty picture they make. A comparatively small number use tables and chairs as they should, and hold their bodies in graceful pose.

The legs of the chair are constructed for the purpose of supporting the chair. But many girls seem to be decided by an impression that they are attached to the chair in order that the occupant may twine her legs about them. The rungs are also supports for the chair. They are not intended to be used as foot rests. There seems to be a false impression in regard to the use of chair rungs.

I believe girls are more inclined to attempt physical contortions at the dinner or tea table than older women. Years bring dignity which will not permit such conduct. Furthermore, they generally add to the poundage to a degree which prevents older women from twining their legs around the legs of chairs and lolling over a table. Girls, on the other hand, are lithe and supple and the lives many lead are conducive to nervousness, which makes them fidget unless their feet and limbs are securely anchored.

There is a vast difference between awkward and graceful and dignified positions. Unfortunately, girls seem to assume carelessness positions in public restaurants more often than in the privacy of their own homes.

I have seen girls who never thought of lolling over the table and twisting their legs about their chairs when at home or dining in the home of friends or acquaintances—go through these very performances as soon as they seat themselves in public restaurants. They seem to reserve their grace and beauty for their friends and disregard the opinions of those they consider strangers. It does not seem to occur to them that they may be embarrassing their companions—and they do, if their companions happen to be men, for men, as a rule, demand dignified conduct from the girls they invite to dine or drink tea with them in restaurants.

The same table manners and postures that are in accord with the dignity of the home are just as necessary, if not more so, in the restaurants.

Perhaps this subject makes a special appeal to me for I have just journeyed across the continent on a long theatrical tour. On my journey I dined in many restaurants and hotels and nearly everywhere I saw girls in most ungraceful and actually awkward positions. Some of them had their feet perched on the rungs of their chairs and their limbs twined around the legs. Others crossed their legs—some twisting their feet back under their chairs. Others stretched their arms over the table and rested on their elbows. A few were actual contortionists. All seemed to be anxious to avoid appearing well bred.

It is just as essential to sit correctly at a table as to use the proper forks and spoons in eating. Table etiquette extends under and around, as well as over and above the table.

Don't discard your dignity. It is a graceful form to wear at any dinner table. If you want to pose as a contortionist, try the circus ring. It will pay you better if you succeed—but if you desire to appear well bred, be dignified and graceful at all times—but especially when you take a seat at a table in a public place.

The world's product of lead pencils probably amounts to nearly 2,000,000,000 a year, half of which are made from American-grown cedar.
