CURRY COAST BEAUTY SPOT

up a divide between Coquille waters and a Sike river. We followed this divide and went down on the south end and crossed a creek afterward known as Johnson creek, and then crossed over the divide to Rogue river at Big Bend.

We went up Rogue river, making and cutting a trail and blazing it all the way. It was a rough route.

Mule Decamped, Names Given. We followed the river to where we could see what is now known as Big Meadows. We were making our way through thick brush high on the mountain side.

While we were waiting for a particularly heavy place to be cleared by the trailmakers, Lieutenant Williamson dismounted from his mule, whose name was John, and let him graze.

Five years later, at the Siletz reservation, I ran across this mule in the possession of the Indians. We went as far as Big Meadows, for Lieutenant Stanton decided that the country was so rough and difficult that a road connecting Port Orford with the Willamette valley trail to California, was impracticable, so we returned to Port Orford.

BIG RECEPTION PLANNED

Portland dealers can take either the Columbia Highway or the inland route. The route in Hillsboro, Forest Grove, Timber, Vernonia, Jewell and Astoria is declared better, though longer.

Astoria also is joining in the tour and many motorists have already signed for a trip to Seaside.

Frightened Deer Swims in Ocean. Attempt Made to Rescue Animal—Deer Finally Reaches Land and Runs Into Bushes.

Narransett, July 22.—It is not often that a deer puts in an appearance at the pier but one was sighted not long ago, and well out in the ocean. The deer was first seen by guards at the life-saving station, who assert that after swimming for a time the deer made its way to the ocean front, where it rested, evidently quite exhausted, on the rocks not far from Ocean road.

The captain of the life-saving station ordered several of his men to put out a boat and drive the deer from the rocks to shore. The animal was frightened and dashed wildly from the rocks to the shore and landed inside of the new ocean front at one of the hotels. It is said, "The terror-stricken animal dashed back to the ocean again, and then turned and swam once more for shore. Upon reaching land for the second time the creature disappeared in Castle Woods.
