

"What's the fun of reading all about great men and great women and great everything when a person has to do just common, ordinary things all the whole time?" And then, because Jack was in the habit of being careful, he picked up the book he had thrown down, straightened the cover neatly and laid the book on the table.

"I do wish I could do something great just once! That's what I wish!" Jack wandered idly out onto the front porch and then, tempted by the pleasant shade of the big oak tree, he strolled out and sat down under its broad branches.

"I do wish I could do something great, I do! I mean to sit right here till I think of something that will be wonderful enough to startle everybody in the whole world! So there " An l with that declaration Jack leaned back against the tree trunk and began to think.
