

SOLDIER SAYS WOMAN WAS CAUSE OF ATTACK ON CORPORAL SUTTON

"Prowling Dynamiter" May Have Been Rival of National Guardsman He Shot

That Corporal William Sutton, who was shot through the shoulder Thursday night at the Lincoln street station of the Portland Railway, Light & Power company, was not the victim of a prowling dynamiter, but was shot by a chauffeur in a quarrel over a woman, is the belief of many officers who worked on the case Thursday night and Friday. The only evidence pointing to the act as that of a prowling dynamiter was the finding of a piece of black fuse near the scene of the shooting, and railroad men say this might have dropped out of a car of cordwood, into which it could easily have been thrown at some logging camp.

Soldier Says Rival's Quarrel

Special Agents Lou Wagner and Keller of the Portland Railway, Light & Power company, who investigated the shooting Thursday night, were approached after the shooting by a soldier, who said that Corporal Sutton and a chauffeur had quarreled over a girl. The soldier said that he and the chauffeur had been rivals for the girl's favor, and that he believed that the automobile man had sought Sutton out and fought with him over the woman. He was asked who the chauffeur was, and answered that he was either the driver of a four-horse car that had a stand near a north end hotel or else the driver of one of the army cars.

This soldier was taken to the police station Thursday night to the police station and questioned by Captain Inskeep, but did not throw much more light upon the case. He was taken through the North End by policemen and Lou Wagner in an effort to identify the chauffeur but failed to do so.

Sutton Now at Barracks

Friday Corporal Sutton was transferred from St. Vincent's hospital to the military hospital at Vancouver Barracks. His wound was said to be doing well. The soldier who gave the railroad men and the police the story of the rivalry of the girl was also taken to Vancouver for questioning by regimental and federal officers. Detectives Hellyer and Tackaberry worked on the shooting all day Friday but turned up nothing new, they said.

Grave Carelessness Causes Boy's Death

This Is Gift of Verdict Returned by Coroner's Jury in Case Against Owner of Pharmacy and Clerk

A coroner's jury investigating the death Wednesday night of 3-year-old Rene Wright, returned a verdict Friday night declaring that L. H. Schultz, proprietor of a drug store at 1621 East Thirteenth street, was guilty of "grave carelessness" in employing as prescription clerk, Robert Mann, who was not a registered pharmacist.

The death of the child, according to the verdict of the jury, was caused by tablets composed of morphine and hyoscyne, not called for in the prescription written for the child by Dr. R. S. Stearns.

Schultz, taking the stand at the inquest, said that he had applied for the position, representing himself as a registered pharmacist, and that he had taken the young man at his word without investigating his credentials. Mann, acting under instructions from his attorney, refused to take the stand.

Mann and Schultz are awaiting trial on a charge of involuntary manslaughter.

Bed Time Tales

BY CLARA INGRAM JUDSON

A Leaf's Wish

ONE dark winter day, a group of dead leaves lay in a dingy gutter. Dirt was under them, dust on top of them and dull gray clouds hung over them.

"I wish I was something besides a dead leaf," said one leaf. "I think that's such a stupid thing to be!"

"It may be stupid, but I don't see how you are to help it with what you are," said another sensibly. "I don't like it any better than you do, but I don't worry about it."

"That's all very well for you to say," said the first complainingly, "but think how many lovely things there are in the world! Flowers and stars and birds! Why couldn't I have been one of those?"

"I don't know any reason, except that you are not," laughed the second leaf cheerfully, "and that isn't a bad reason, I'm sure."

"I want fun and a good time," went on the first leaf, "I want a lot of things."

"Well, maybe we can get something you wish for if you try very hard," said the cheerful leaf. "You decide on something you want and maybe we can plan to get it."

"What can a dead leaf get?" the first leaf asked.

"I don't know," said the cheerful leaf. "I wonder what I could do about that—it seems pretty hard for a dead leaf to manage. I think I'll ask my friend the wind, maybe he can help me."

Just then a tiny little breeze snuggled down by the leaves for a rest. "If that breeze," said the leaf, "can you tell me how an old dead leaf can fly like a bird?"

"No, I can't, I never heard of such a thing," laughed the breeze, but when he saw how disappointed the leaf was, he said:

"Well, work, work, work. If we have a talent for anything useful, however slight, it must be developed and developed. She is educated or she is ignorant. She is educated or she is stupid. She accomplishes or she is a failure. So many women have good intentions just as far as they do not inconvenience them. They do not care to be disturbed from reading a silly fiction—even if they were to be greatly benefited by the disturbance. They will grow fat and heavy with self-indulgence and let the poor starve and die for the want of just a little of their surplus of food and comfort. They do not care, if they do not know about it—and if they do read or hear of such conditions they say: 'Too bad, but it takes all kinds to make a world.'"

These are not the half-way days. These are the days when only the fittest shall survive—the women who do things. We are all going to be registered very soon. The women in New York have and are being registered now. Our qualifications will be put on record. The government will be looking for the greatest curse, usefulness is the greatest blessing women can enjoy. Those who are half-hearted have got to decide which way they will turn, forward or backward. There is no half-way. They either do or they do not do. There is no greater beautifier of mind or person than the enjoyment in the satisfaction gained by your work. The work of your hands and minds. Whether it is a soldier, strong or wounded; a soldier's wife or mother, or whether it is some poor child or invalid. Do not go half-way. Stop with your good intentions.

We should all work with one interest regardless of who receives the reward. I do not care for the reward other than the knowledge that I have made one soul a little happier. Do some work in a whole-hearted manner. Be qualified for usefulness. Forget your selfish motives; give your time and all else you can for the benefit of others. Go the whole way and be an entity in this world. Do not go half-way—and be a non-entity.

Nothingness of Half-Way

Mexico May Try in Vain to Get Money

Washington, July 28.—(I. N. S.)—The fact that Mexico is not an ally of the United States probably will prevent that country from obtaining a loan in the United States. The treasury department Friday indicated great interest in the efforts of the southern republic to arrange a loan of $150,000,000 in the United States through New York bankers. It was believed government sanction of this loan will be refused. Such action would effectively prevent American bankers from advancing the money.

MONDAY'S THRIFT

THOUGHT Here is an appetizing way to use the meat that will be left from the Sunday roast:

Meat pie—Cut meat into fairly small pieces. Stew in saucepan with a little water, left over gravy or soup, salt to taste, and such seasoning vegetables as onions and celery, if desired. Thicken liquid with flour. Line baking dish with biscuit dough, pour in the meat filling, cover with biscuit dough and bake in a medium oven.

If the quantity of meat is small, a little macaroni or diced potato may be added.

Such pies to be at their best must be well seasoned.

WOMAN'S LACK OF CONFIDENCE

A new way of putting the table of the Greek god's vulnerable heel was that recently incorporated in a current magazine story dealing with the self-conceit of man.

"There is, somewhere upon every man, the spot by which he was held when dipped in the waters of modesty," ran this recent fable.

I sometimes think that woman—the average woman—never approached the brink of those waters, so lacking is she in self-conceit. You would think so, too, could you see some of the many letters which I receive; but I would never allow you or anyone to see them, in fact!

"I have such a horrid complexion. I do wish you would tell me—" etc.

"My skin is so dark and blotchy and I so much want to improve—"

"It seems to me no one has so poor a complexion as I—"

"When you spoke of the slouching walk which women too often have, I made up my mind to reform. Can you direct me to a good teacher—"

"Your little article regarding careless attire, might have been directed right at me. Will you give me the address of a good tailor?"

"When you wrote about teeth, I felt that I should take it to myself, for my teeth are horrid and I do neglect them. Please tell me of a good dentist."

And so on, at such length that I cannot but believe in the absence of vanity in women.

And—do you know—I have not had

Spurious Pay Checks Are in Circulation

Warning against spurious Northern Pacific pay checks is contained in a telegram received Friday evening by The Portland detective department from the Spokane office of the railroad. The checks, according to the message, have been printed by someone not authorized to do so, and 15 or 20 of them have been cashed in the Twin Cities. The fraudulent pay checks can be distinguished from those issued by the road by the fact that the signature of J. L. Honala is printed upon the worthless checks instead of written, and that the word "signature" on the back of each check, by a typographical error, is spelled "signature."
