It had been feared that some of the nations would hold out for a membership of at least five. This would make a body that would not alone be unnecessarily large, but would mean that much time would be wasted in unnecessary oratory. A commission made up of one or two representatives of each nation would be ideal, officials said here today, inasmuch as it would be able to expedite all business and would save much time.

Decision on the membership is exentente capitals. It was said at the White House today that just as soon as an agreement was reached the president would answer who will represent the United States. If the membership is limited to two, these two would be the president and his secretary of state at the outset, and when the president returned to this country his place would be taken, it is assumed, by Colonel

Meanwhile evidence multiplies to indicate that the session of the peace conference will not be protracted. It is understood here that a definite agreement has been reached to hold the business of the conference to the points outlined by the president. The first be to work out the plans for the proposed league of nations. This will be comparatively easy, inasmuch as the general outline of the procedure to be followed already has been freely discussed in the informal exchanges beference is restricted.
