

SUPPLY SERVICE OF ARMY IS VERY STRENUOUS JOB

Captain Hotchkiss Writes of Work With Yanks at Winnall Down Camp, Winchester, Eng.

ENGLAND FACES HANDICAP

End of War Finds Industry Disorganized and Enormous Debt Hanging Over Nation.

A letter received from Captain Clarence R. Hotchkiss, of the 162d United States Infantry in command of the staff of Winnall Down camp, Winchester, England, which was written two days after the armistice was signed, gives an interesting account of the captain's work in England. He writes in part: "Since arriving in England last Christmas on the Tuscania, which was sunk before she reached port on her return trip, I have been very busy as there has always been a bit more work to do than there have been men to do it, in spite of the enormous size of the expeditionary force, and the men, who, like myself, were not permitted to go to the lines or who were returned from the lines after being disabled for active service, have been very busy administering to the various elements of the great service of supply which must support the armies at the front and in doing all of the innumerable tasks in connection with the transportation, provisioning, arming and equipping and disciplining the 2,000,000 men.

Officers All Busy
"I have been commanding my own company without the assistance of any of my company officers, who are all hard at work at other stations, commanding this camp, sitting on a great many courts-martial and boards of officers, and doing other work as it came along, and have not been able to get away from work on rare occasions for a day or two at a time.

"I have not, however, been without opportunity to see many of the noted places and learn many interesting things as I have crossed England and traveled in different parts of France to the general headquarters far in the interior, and have been stationed for over six months within 60 miles of London where I have had an opportunity to become acquainted with the viewpoint of different classes of the people of England.

"At the present time I am stationed very near the city which was for 400 years the capital of England, was the seat of government under the Saxons, the Danes, the Normans, and the Conqueror, under the Danes, the Normans, and the Conqueror, under the Normans, up to, and including the time of William the Conqueror.

Many Changes Wrought
"I have noted with interest the attitude of the English people toward America, and the effect upon the relations of the two nations and their relative influence in the world as seen by themselves, of the war. The war has brought out, or at least hastened, tremendous changes in the positions of America and England, and the thinking people of England are well aware of these changes and of their effect.

"There is no doubt that England faces the period of reconstruction with an enormous handicap of national debt and with the added handicap of industrial disorganization due to the mobilization of industry for the war, while the war has helped America to find herself, developed a spirit of national unity, and pointed out to her many weaknesses in her national organization which are corrected, will in a short time make up for the economic losses which she has sustained through the war.

America's Policies Interest
"The policies under which America sets out on her work of reconstruction are of fundamental importance, and we, who are here in the A. E. F., will try to keep ourselves informed as to these policies, for they mean quite as much to us as they do to those who are at home, and while we cannot have any influence upon them, being in the service, we are looking forward to the time when we will be able to take our part in fitting America to the world leadership to which we cannot but believe she is destined."

Captain Hotchkiss was a former member of the Ford and Bear's board and is well known in business circles of this city. He says further, that he doesn't expect to complete his work in England for many months, as all American camps in England and England will have to be cleaned out and closed up and a large army of occupation will undoubtedly be furnished by America for the thin borders of the German empire for many months to come.

"It is hard to describe a battle," writes Lieutenant Ray Terry Williams of Forest Grove in Belgium, where he was later wounded seriously. "You send forward the proper information at the proper time for the forward move of battalions, and the order of march goes out and away we go. The artillery barrage opens and I sat under a number of big guns sending a few messages to Fritz and believe me, it is some doing and sounds exactly like a flock of big express trains going by very fast. There is a sort of song in their steel throats that has the most enticing sound when it is going away from you, but pretty disagreeable when they are too far away and Fritz is only letting you hear the brrrr-bang! right onto your position. But you soon learn that it isn't half as bad as it sounds and you can be in the thick of it and never be touched, and you can be long way off and get the deuce shot out of you. "The machine gun sure has a distinctive sound that you can hear and pick out regardless of any sound, and believe me, says Terry Williams, the machine gun. But he does not like the marksmanship of our riflemen and I had the pleasure of laying up on a hill in a hot place and directing a couple of aid nests and directing the fire that drove out some of the machine gunners and they run like hell as soon as the fire reaches them. We went forward to a certain attack in a place that was sure some place, take it from your only son. Every confused spot was perfectly covered with machine gun and artillery fire and how any man lived through it I do not know nor does any one else. But a little party of us walked through it and never got a scratch, by the grace of the Almighty. Several did get scratched up a bit. But anyway, our men went into it and took machine guns with no other weapon than the Al's mighty help and straight shooting with a revolver and believe me Fritz has found out that when our fellows draw down on him he had better surrender or get some mighty quick cover or to quit working his infernal machine guns. Never saw so many machine guns in my life.

"By jinks, I could tell quite a bunch of yarns about our first three mixups that are interesting, but will wait and tell you about them when I get home. This old outfit is sure proud of itself. A certain unit on our right did not carry any too darn much for artillery fire and tried to find a little safer place. Our outfit stuck and then advanced, in which mixup I had the pleasure of getting ahead of the front wave and being ing among the first 10 men into and through said town. And it was some little fight, believe anyone from out of the whole division. "We went back in a couple of times after that and delivered a punch. The last proposition we tackled was too much for us as we needed a little artillery to blow a hill off the map. When we came out we saw wheel to wheel a bunch of artillery lined up within about a mile of that hill, and though I have never heard what happened to that hill, I would sure gamble that Fritz will not habitate that part of the country again for many moons, as we now have all the rest of that said country. That whole Argonne forest affair was another spicy bit of scrapping. Gee whizz! Barb wire and machine guns and trenches galore in old Hindenburg's line and we took about 10 miles of that line in depth and about a mile in width and they surely had organized for an indefinite period of time, as they had thought to stop us in about six kilometers, but Hindy had the surprise of his life and we slept in his bunk and took all his maps and papers and all the rest of his whole confounded army stuff and busted up a glorious war for him. He was sure camped for an indefinite stay."

Walter F. Tracey, writing to his parents at Newport from France, says he will be perfectly content to enjoy all further war experience from a comfortable seat in a five-cent movie after being through some of the "real-blown-in-the-glass" war that he has recently experienced. He says: "I've seen war by using all my seven senses, the seventh being the one that compels you to lie flat on the ground whenever a big one comes over. The kind of war you see at the movies is inspiring, but lacks some of the essentials of the real thing. The rain, the mud, the smells and noise aren't reproduced at all. That place up there is no place for a lady, and I'm fed up on souvenirs. When I first went up everybody was crazy about Boche souvenirs. We dragged in cartloads of stuff every day and I suddenly got disgusted after three weeks of it and threw away all my souvenirs, including a pair of fancy Boche suspenders. "One morning while we were eating breakfast, Jerry sprung a surprise on us by throwing over a shell that lit just 30 feet from me. We all ducked into dugouts and it was a good thing we did for he threw over nine more. It's a great life and now we are going back to civilization, into the realm of the twittering birds and the sad-eyed civilians. "The other day we moved into a town where we were the first allied soldiers that had been in the place and we were given the best billets. The one I drew had a fine fireplace, a piano, a Boche phonograph and records, cupboards and dishes, with furniture, including two large canopied beds. We even had a canary bird and a pot of gold fish. We thought we had the comforts of home 'skun' a mile.

"The only thing wrong about it was that one side of a room had been torn out by a shell and as the mud was ankle deep all around and our rations weren't the best, we didn't enjoy it so much. "Bill and I got two feather beds and smothered ourselves under another just like two sardines between two slices of bread, but I honestly believe every species of predatory insect was represented in that small room and today those mattresses are lying out in the back yard in the rain and Bill and I are sleeping on the floor in our own blankets. "All sorts of litter lies around the buildings which have been plundered. Clothing, hoop skirts, children's toys, and household furniture are scattered everywhere. Whether it was the work of the fleeing civilians, the retreating Germans, or our own troops, I can't say as it has probably been gone over by each outfit."

In a letter to his parents, Judge and Mrs. L. M. Blowers, of Hood River, Paul M. Blowers says his unit has been sent to St. Nazaire, where they are engaged in automobile repair work. One of the places of interest in which his unit was recently billeted was Billom, one of the famous university towns of Europe. In the eleventh century, according to Mr. Blowers' letters, the university there had 2,000 students, who lived in quarters called "la Bourgeois" which still exist.
