MACHINE GUNS BRISTLE

Government Troops and Spartacan Followers Are Active; Soapbox Speakers Are Busy.

Berlin, Jan. 9.—(Delayed.)—Twenty minutes before midnight tonight I arrived in the heart of the armed camp which is now Berlin. Perhaps an account of my experience in entering the city will give an idea of conditions as they are in the German capital. At 9 o'clock this morning I left Oldenzaal, the Dutch frontier town, with the prospect if there were no delays, of reaching Berlin at 8 o'clock in the evening. Such news as trickled through from here was far from reassuring with the result that there were few travelers and consequently the trip was extremely comfortable.

There was some anxiety among the passengers as to the connection with the main line at Lohne, as rumors were afloat of the activity of the Spartacus crowd in Dusseldorf, the starting point of the Berlin through train. It was but a few minutes late, however, and by 1 o'clock the last lap of the journey was begun at Hanover.

Alarming Reports Come

Alarming reports reached us there about the fighting in Berlin and no papers from that city had come through. At this point the travelers thinned out until only about 50 civilians remained. These included three women. The rest of the passengers were officers and soldiers. There was a feeling of extreme tenseness at every one of the frequent stops at signal stations and there was a great clatter of opening windows the moment the wheels ceased to revolve.

In spite of the interruption all went well and it looked as though we would get through without trouble, especially when the wide circle of lights marking the outskirts of the capital came into view. They were certainly a welcome sight and I congratulated myself on my arrival in such a short time.

But a shock came at Charlottenburg station. When the train drew in all the passengers were peremptorily ordered out. Questioning drew forth only vague replies to the effect that the Spartacus forces were attacking the line just beyond and that it was impossible to reach the center of the city.

Speakers Harrangue Crowds

Thus I was left standing at 10 p. m., in a strange section where there were no hotel accommodations and apparently no means of transportation. There were strange sights in the "platz" in front of the station. Dozens of groups of people of all classes were swarming about excited speakers mounted on boxes under the brilliancy of the electric lights.

Detachments of government soldiers were appearing suddenly from the side streets and buildings and hurrying in this and that direction. One party of a dozen soldiers came up escorting a young woman who struggled and cursed as she was hurried into a military headquarters that once had been dainty modiste parlors. She was a Sparatcus adherent and was hissed by the crowds as she disappeared with her captors.

I determined to try to reach Unter den Linden but was told that it was impossible. Some assured me that the center of the town was in ruins. I thought, however, that things could not be much worse and so I set out walking along the streets which were all brilliantly lighted, and after an hour reached the zoological gardens where I found that the subway trains were still running.

I decided to try to reach the Kaiserhof hotel, as the subway station is directly across the street. But on my arrival there I found that the station was closed. The train not stopping I alighted at the next station and started to pick my way back. This section was in remarkable contrast with the suburbs.

All Lights Are Out

Here the lights were out and only the moon shone down the streets which seemed deserted. From several points in the direction of Unter den Linden came the sharp crack of rifle shots and the occasional sputter of machine guns, but where is tramped over the black glistening asphalt all was quiet.

Two blocks from the Kaiserhof I was stopped by a sentry with a fixed bayonet, who appeared like a grey ghost from a post against a wall. I could not proceed without a written pass, but after I had managed to explain that I had just come from Holland and showed papers to prove it, he called two more ghosts like himself from nowhere, and put me between them and so we marched to the Kaiserhof. I then understood why I was not allowed to walk merrily there. The hotel had been turned into a fortress. An iron lattice was drawn across the front door while the whole place was in darkness, save for a feeble light in the niche behind me occupied by the porter, but now the lair of formidable military personage, who eyed me with a certain degree of suspicion.

Armed Soldiers Asleep on Floors

The marble floor of the magnificent foyer and the thick crimson carpets on the grand staircase were covered with soldiers sleeping with rifles and steel helmets at their sides. The windows facing the street were all bristling with machine guns while outside fully equipped and armed guards marched up and down. The hotel manager and his wife were conducted from somewhere below stairs. They were sorry they could do nothing for me—not even give me food. They expected the place to be attacked before morning. The manager kindly offered to escort me to another hotel he mentioned. So we—the manager bareheaded—walked through the lines with the aid of the pass he possessed.

But on our arrival at the hotel he had named no amount of ringing and knocking could induce anybody to appear at the door although it was only 11:15. I told my companion that I could manage and so he left me standing there with my baggage but without hope of finding a lodging.

Machine Guns Menace

Finally I discovered a group of ricketty-looking cabs huddled in a side street, the drivers smoking and talking in low tones. My request to be taken to the Hotel Adlon in Unter den Linden was greeted with laughter. "Impossible" (I was tired of that word), they all said. Unter den Linden was full of machine guns liable to go off at any minute. After much parley I compromised with one of the pirates on the Hotel Esplanade, which I finally reached by a circuitous route.

So here I am. Outside, the big moon shines softly on the stricken, bewildered city. From my room I see thousands of winking street lights, while a yellow glow behind the curtains in the houses tells me that Berlin is not sleeping. Tomorrow I shall go over to see those machine guns.
