The Professor Tries Once More THE young professor was just about discouraged. He had fallen into the Beaver canal and had been nearly drowned; he had slipped into the mud and spoiled his clothes; and he had torn his hands climbing a tree-and he had never seen a single Beaver.

He had been asked to write a book Look, Mother! See if tongue about them in books, but he had never seen a single one. Now he thought of a new plan. He knew all the Beaver habits and he knew that they did all their work at night and slept in the day time, so he laid his plans very carefully.

The young professor did so much want to write a book and tell all about wild animals he had known. But how could he know an animal unless he could see it? So he wouldn't give it up; and he got a rubber sheet and a waterproof coat and a rubber hat, some sandwiches and a flash-light and his note book and pencil and with all these things be set off for the Beaver dam.

"Modern Drama" was the subject for the afternoon and Mrs. D. M. Miss Nina Greathouse captivated the women with her reading of "The Maker of Dreams," by Oliphant Down and followed it with illuminating sidelights on some of the hest plays for reading, pointing out the difference in the aim of the author who is writing plays to be read and to be acted. She deplored the great waste of time and words of the novelist, saying that, after all, it is the dialogue that the reader wants and that the magination of the intelligent reader supplies the scenery without the aid of pages of description. Mrs. Thomas Moffatt recited a cycle of dream-poems of great charm and delicacy, which she
