Health Fight Is Outlined to Nurses

They Are Urged to Help in Post-War Work of the Government.

OUTLINING an active health campaign to be conducted in Oregon and urging nurses to enlist in post-war service for the government, Miss May S. Loomis, director of nursing for the Northwest division of the American Red Cross, with headquarters in Seattle, was a speaker on Wednesday afternoon at the meeting of the State Nurses' association, which met at the Central library. Miss Loomis spoke of the need of educating the public in the care of infants and of the sick in the home. The importance of public health nursing centers for every county was another point of importance in her talk. Miss Loomis is assisting in the general work of the Red Cross in Portland and will aid in the organization of class work to be conducted under the local chapter of the city.

The meeting was presided over by Mrs. Marian Chase Warren, who called upon delegates from the Northwest Nurses' conference, held at Glacier National park, July 15, for reports. Miss Mary Cronin, Miss Edith Duke and Miss Mary C. Campbell spoke briefly on the conference work.

DRESS

IF THE bouffant skirt actually does come in in earnest, all the crispness that we might derive from the coming of a style so radically different from the one we have been accustomed to. For, although we have clung to our pencil silhouette, we have been assured for more than a year that crinolines were on their way. We have seen them much on the stage and somewhat in the ballroom. There is no thrill left in the suggestion. Whereas, if they had come suddenly they would have been eminently diverting.

The question is: Will crinolines actually come? Some authorities, there be who say that we want something entirely unexpected, that we are looking for a surprise and that anything that has been so much heralded as the skirt about to be at all. Besides, there always has to be a very good reason for women to wear skirts of that sort or they won't wear them, and just at present it is rather doubtful whether there is sufficient excuse.

CRINOLINES INSTEAD OF EXERCISE It was because a queen—or an empress, to be accurate, for it was Louis Napoleon's wife, Eugenie—wished to conceal a too rotund figure that crinolines came in in mid-Victorian days. They stayed in no doubt because those mid-Victorian ladies knew nothing of golf or tennis or swimming or fencing or any of the other diversions that encroach on hips. They could appear slender when to do so all that was necessary was to pull in their waist at a certain point. The figure didn't really have to be small; it could hide beneath the folds of a crinoline. Much was said about 18-inch waists, but silence prevailed concerning the girth of the hips below.

It must really have been convenient to make amends for too indolent living and too many chocolate creams merely by one heroic tug at the stay below. And those heavy veiled, though somewhat alluring Spanish infants, that have come down to us immortal on the canvases of Velasquez were an indolent lot, you may be sure. They knew nothing of the secret of youth of Diana of Poitiers, who insisted always in a rigorous horseback ride before breakfast and a daily cold bath—a thing most extraordinary in those days. So the Spanish Infantas perpetuated for some time a vogue for hip crinolines that were fairly box-like. And the Turkish ladies love their bonbons and their indolence and cling to trousers costumes that are very bouffant, while the ladies of Japan who allow themselves no such indulgence keep themselves in trim for the sake of their kimonos.

A frock which consists of a huge skirt—and a black velvet girde, with straps of jet over the shoulders and a matching bracelet. Black and silver brocade is used for the skirt.

whether it is a fashion that will materialize or whether it will continue next season as in the one that is passed, to appear occasionally, a charming note of contrast to the rest. It is an open question and one that is much debated, for of course the man who makes dresses in large quantities is not going to preach an ardent crusade in favor of bouffant skirts in a season when goods are especially scarce and dear. The bouffant skirt might mean doubling the yardage of material for each frock. In the frock you have for today it
