Complainants of the high cost of livng meet with little sympathy from William Handley, the sage of Eastern Oregon, who calls Burns his home. "High priced living is nothing but the bunching of the herd with their superior ideals that someone must feed them," declares Handley. "It is not a question of money buying it. But they want the high lights of the city," added Handley. "So long as they collect in the cities with the country lying idle, the top of high prices will not be reached. They have got to stop some place and do some oldfashioned farming with real interest before living is going to get cheaper. The big part of America is in cities and towns and they have not got the vision. There is no trouble to get good land. The olg mistake is the free home. It takes a good many generations to get a farm expensive as a city lot and a city home. and with the modern theory of good roads with the equipment that goes with it, there is no reason why people should not balance the condition of living within a few years.
